Chaplain Teter's work has been cordially endorsed by Hon. N. B. Broward, Governor of Florida, who has commended it as "deserving of all assistance possible." Secretary of State H. Clay Crawford, the State Treasurer, State Comptroller, Attorney General, Commissioner of Agriculture, and Superintendent of Public Instruction, all join the Governor in this endorsement. The Commissioner of Agriculture (Hon. B. E. McLin) adds: "The prisoners and people of the State are indebted to Rev. James C. Teter for having done more hard work, with practical results, among the prison camps, than any other person or organization of persons in the State. Too much cannot be said of his great interest in the prisoners." He recommends an appropriation by the State to properly support the religious work in the prison camps, but up to the present time nothing has been done in the matter.

Meanwhile, the chaplain's arduous work of traveling up and down between the camps, preaching and talking to the men and boys, goes on uninterruptedly. He loves his boys, and his salutary and timely counsel has been the means of turning many of these prisoners to better lives. It would be a noble and proper thing were the wealthy and progressive State of Florida, at the next session of the Legislature, to show its humane interest in the moral reform of these unfortunates by making generous provision for the Gospel work in the prison camps.

Any reader interested in Chaplain Teter's work may address him at Saint's Rest, Minneola, Lake County, Fla.

Mars May be Inhabited

Professor Percival Lowell, a leading English astronomer, who took a prominent part in the observations of Mars made during the 1907 opposition, has just announced "some of the important results attained." He declares that the planet is at present the abode of "intelligent, constructive life." This he claims as the "direct sequitur" of his latest observations, and adds: "The theory of such life upon Mars was in no way an a priori hypothesis on my part, but deduced from the outcome of observation, and my observations since have fully confirmed it. No other supposition is consonant with all the facts observed."

CALLED HIGHER

Miss Ann E. Dickinson passed from earth April 22, 1907, at San Angelo, Texas, in the fifty-ninth year of her age. She was an earnest worker in the Master's vineyard, and had been a teacher in the public schools for forty years.

Samuel Hopper, an old and faithful subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, died September 29, 1906, in Brownwood, Texas. Mr. Hopper was a railroad engineer, and died from an accident received during the discharge of his duty.

On June 19, Mrs. O. Blakeslee, of Atwater, Ohio, entered into the higher life at the ripe age of ninety three years. For seventy-seven of these years she had lived a true Christian life, depending for guidance, next to her Bible, upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Another member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family for many years went to heaven when George Dart, of Port Orford, Oregon, passed away on May 13, in his eighty eighth year. He was an earnest Christian and had been affiliated with the Baptist denomination from early life. His aged widow has the sympathy of many friends.

Four months after happily celebrating the sixtieth anniversary of her wedding day, Mrs. Joshua B Broomell departed this life on May 26, 1907 in Washington, D. C., having lived for eighty-nine years. For seventy seven years she had been a fervent Christian; her aged husband looks forward to a sure reunion in a brighter life.

One of God's elect children in the Methodist denomination passed to her reward on May 4, 1907, in her seventy-seventh year. Mrs. Cyrena B. Osborn, of Converse, Ind., was a woman whose interests were centred in the cause of the Master, and her self-sacrifice, devotion and holy zeal has moved and inspired many to more noble and righteous lives. Methodism has sustained a great loss in Mrs. Osborn's departure, although in its hands she has placed much of her earthly prosperity, through which doubtless hundreds will arise to call her blessed.

William P. Wagner, near Sterling, N. D., passed away June 21, 1907, aged seventy-seven years six months. Mr. Wagner was born in Chester County, Pa., moved with his family to North Dakota in 1883, took up a homestead, and lived on the same until called away. He leaves a wife and son to mourn his departure. He was a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Virginia Jackson Rutherford, born at South Carrollton, Ky., February 11, 1844, recently passed away. She was an earnest Christian woman and a member of the old school Presbyterian Church for years. She leaves two children, Mr. S. A. Rutherford, of San Antonio, Tex., and Mrs. W. J. Carnohan, of Kingsville, Tex.

Mrs. Lucy C., wife of Isaac Haley, passed to the better life on the 25th of February, 1907, from her home in Philadelphia, aged eighty-one years. For years Mrs. Haley had been a "shut-in," but her family never saw her other than bright and cheerful, and she knew how to make a happy home for her seven children. She was a stanch Methodist from her birth, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was always a treasured friend during her years of affliction.

A True Helpmeet Gone Ho

A FAITHFUL minister's no less faith wife of thirty years was lost to family and to the community when, in month of May last, Mrs. Minerva, wife the Rev. R. W. Graham, of Seattle, Wa went home.

The Rev. Dr. Schenk, pastor of the worth Church of Seattle, pays the foll ing glowing tribute to the memory of M Graham: "This sainted woman shared husband's responsibilities as a clergyr in far more than the ordinary sense. I life was so ordered that thousands felt holy influence. The young women of husband's several pastorates were pecially uplifted by the spell of beaut Christian example which this holy wor laid upon them, and though she lived seventy-one years, her spirit was insti with immortal youth until her very la day.

"Mrs. Graham esteemed it a duty to k in close touch with the movements Christ's kingdom upon earth, and foun possible to do so through the columns THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which, next her Bible, she regarded as her source inspiration."

The husband and two adult sons are deed mourners, yet they rejoice in memory which remains to them of the w and mother's luminous life, a true "p traiture of goodness in the flesh."

Israel's Perversity

By Mrs. M. Baxter

HOW the experiences of Israel in the wilderness illustrate the Psalmist's statement that "the Lord is merci- and gracious, slow to anger and plen- us in mercy." His people, just come t of Egypt, fainted with hunger in the derness. Despair seized upon them, ause, in spite of their wondrous deliv- nce from death at the Red Sea, and manifestation of God's power over e elements, they were so accustomed to k at things visible, and go by past ex- riences, that, seeing no visible means of sistence, and being each one personally ly partially acquainted with God, they nted their despair in saying bitter ngs against Moses and Aaron; and, as y had done at the Red Sea, they spoke dying in the wilderness, setting utterly one side as valueless the promise of d to bring them into a land full of lk and honey!

But Moses was patient and God was rciful and gracious. "Like as a father ieth his children," the Lord was merci- l to them in their sore need, and God d to Moses, "I will rain bread from aven for you." And he did. They had rmured at Marah, where they wanted ter; they murmured in the wilderness Sin, where they wanted bread; but d did not reproach them; he supplied eir need. "Merciful and gracious, slow anger and plenteous in mercy"; but eir hearts were not melted by his mercy, d they made no acknowledgment of eir sin. God's character was vindi- ted; but the people under trial only oved their ingratitude and unbelief.

Now he leads them further. Up to this ne there had been no written law. "By e law is the knowledge of sin." Their nscience must be awakened, and God ves them his holy law. In their dis- ss at the Red Sea, at Marah in their irst, and in the wilderness of Sin in eir hunger, they had dealt only with oses and Aaron. Now God would speak to them with a voice out of the burning fire on Mount Sinai. He would himself make known his will. The peo- ple could no longer have an excuse that they did not know God, or that they did not know his will. The law was given, and there was everything in the circum- stances attending it to make them fear a holy God, who had shown himself so merciful towards them. But fear alone cannot change the heart.

The next test, the long absence of Moses in the mountain, where they knew he had gone to meet with God, wore out their patience. They could no longer say they were hungry or thirsty. Day by day the manna fell from heaven; day by day the clear water which flowed from the rock was within their reach; but they be- came impatient. Why should Moses de- lay so long? They wanted to be going, and to get near to the land they were to possess; and they did not respect the will of God, which detained Moses. God had served them in their supplies; they knew him as Provider; but in spite of his holy law made known to them, they still acted as unreasoning, peevish children, and the spirit of obedience was absent from them, in spite of their own words: "All that the Lord saith unto us we will do, and be obedient" (Ex. 19: 8; 24: 3-7). Moses had said unto the elders when he went up into the mountain, "Tarry ye here for us until we come again to you." But they would not tarry, and the weak Aaron yielded to their desire, and the idolatry of Egypt was renewed. They made a golden calf to worship—some visible thing —while their leader was not visible among them.

Then came the descent of Moses from the mountain, his intercession for the peo- ple, God's offer to him to destroy the peo- ple, and to make of him a great nation; and Moses' pleading with God to consider his word and promise and his name among the heathen.

Sight Singing Classes to Re-open

MADAME NEWMAN'S Sight Sing- ing Classes last year afforded to thousands of Christian Herald aders a welcome opportunity to study cal music under one of the best of odern teachers, and according to the test and most practical method. Long efore the classes closed letters of delighted ppreciation began to pour in from read- rs in all parts of the country. Letters lso came by hundreds from applicants ho desired to join the classes, but unfor- unately many were too late and were mpelled to await the re-opening of the ght singing course this season.

It is Madame Newman's desire that ese classes, which are specially arranged benefit Christian Herald readers and eir friends, should re-open about No- ember 1. Consequently it is important hat all who intend to join send in their ames as soon as possible, that the enrol- ent in classes by series may be made on he same basis as last year, viz.: Each lass to consist of 200 students. For this urpose we would urge all who intend to oin to send in their names to "Musical Department, The Christian Herald, New York." Young and old can take he course with equal enjoyment. Madame Newman last year had many pupils not et in their teens, and she had hundreds ver forty and fifty, and some even over eventy years of age. The earnest and ainstaking studies of the pupils, who were aught by the simplest and most natural ystem, produced most gratifying results. As the outcome of one winter's teaching, undreds of delighted students have been trained so that they can now sing readily at sight. A few have become suffi- ciently proficient to take up classes, and are now teaching by the Newman method.

Speaking of her mission as a teacher, Madame Newman says:

"To be able to use one's voice in song is a great joy, as every singer knows. Now, 'Sight Singing' means to take up a song and 'read' it, or rather sing it, as you would read a letter. To be popular the system employed must be simple and clear enough to be readily understood, so that self-instruction may be both possible and rapid. I hold that most people have the musical faculty, although it may be quite undeveloped. Study and applica- tion will assuredly develop it. The pleasure derived is well worth the time, labor and money expended, especially where, as in the present case, the readers of your paper have merely a nominal charge to meet."

Applicants desiring to join should send name and address on a postal card to Musical Department, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

A. O. Leonard INVENTOR LEONARD'S ANTISEPTIC EAR DRUM

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1908) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of thousands of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

RIDPATH'S enviable position as an historian is due to his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman Senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can walk with Luther, who did more than any other man to give to the world religious freedom. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest human of all time; the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men and events is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic, troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendour; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written by man.

RIDPATH throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there; patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles with three hundred and fifty Greek ships smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there, gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says, "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another Century, the most colossal world-figure of his time.

Questions and Answers

Inquirer, Emporia, Kan. I have recently seen a reference to a description of the "man of the future" by a celebrated scientist. What does it mean?

You probably refer to the recent claim of a noted writer that, judging from present indications, the coming man will have long arms, large, six-fingered hands, double ear-drums, small legs, no teeth, a longer neck than now, strong nerves, more powerful eyes, etc. The whole picture is a brochure on evolution and not at all scientific.

Mary Wiltse, New Rockford, N. D. Why do you speak of the Catholic Church developing from primitive Christianity? Do you not know that the Protestant Church came into existence on the banks of the Jordan, when Christ appointed ministers and organized missions, etc?

No, we did not know that. If you have any authority to prove it there are many who would be glad to know of it. The Reformation was a protest against the claims and corruptions of the Catholic Church. The word Protestant implies a stand against the position of others, and could scarcely have been used appropriately on the banks of the Jordan. We believe that the doctrines of the Protestant Churches are those that Christ taught, and Paul after him. The Catholic Church must have developed from primitive Christianity. It took on accretions which Luther believed to be unscriptural and against which he protested. The degeneracy of an organization does not disprove its origin.

Georgia has not yet ceased to rejoice over the great Prohibition victory. A reader of this paper, Mrs. J. L. Brownlee, of Albany, writes us:

Our church bells tolled the joyful tidings, and a "praise meeting" gave evidence of grateful hearts.

She encloses a poem composed on the night of the good news, the closing stanza of which is as follows:

Hurrah for grand old Georgia!
With a spotless flag unfurled,
When many broken hearts are healed,
And hope sees a brighter world!
When no longer children's cries are heard
For bread—with no money to buy;
When desolate homes are bright once more,
And temperance is the battle-cry;
When manhood pure and noble
Will rise to heights more high,
In the glorious days that are coming
When "Georgia's going dry."

A. J. M., Ripley, Tenn. Do you think any one besides the disciples saw Jesus after his resurrection?

There is nothing among the various accounts to indicate that there were any other witnesses. Paul speaks of his being seen by five hundred (I. Cor. 15: 6), but he describes them as "brethren," that is, believers. The appearances were not limited to believers in the resurrection. Mary did not know him at first, and Thomas was sceptical until he actually saw and spoke with Jesus. We should suppose that all to whom he appeared were his friends and followers. Probably to others he was invisible. His vanishing at Emmaus and his entrance to the room when the doors were shut imply a spiritual body, though he was careful, by eating before them (Luke 24: 38-43) to convince them that he was not mere spirit. The marks on his hands and feet and the fact of the empty tomb imply that the actual body was raised. It must have been changed, however, and may have been like the spiritual body of which Paul writes (I. Cor. 15: 44).

H. E. C., Pender, Neb. Please give some information about the Earl of Dunmore, who recently died in London.

Charles A. Murray, D.L., F.R.G.S., was the seventh Earl of Dunmore. His other titles were Viscount Fincastle, Lord Murray and Baron Dunmore. He was born in 1841, his mother being a daughter of the eleventh Earl of Pembroke. He married a daughter of the Earl of Leicester in 1866. He served in the Scots Guards, was Lord in Waiting, 1874-1880; late Lord-Lieutenant of Stirlingshire, and Colonel of the Fourth Battalion of the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders. He published several books of travel. He owned nearly 80,000 acres, and had a home in London and one in South Harris, Invernessshire, Scotland. He is succeeded by his son, Viscount Fincastle.

A. C. M., Minneapolis, Minn. Is there any authority for the statement that angels attend the steps of persons living on the earth to protect and help them?

The only Biblical statement that we remember bearing on the question is Hebrews 1: 14—"Are they (angels) not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" In Genesis there is the account of angels bringing Lot from Sodom (Gen. 19: 15). Elsewhere the story of the angel delivering Peter from prison (Acts 5: 19 and 12: 7), and other instances of angelic service.

G. H., Grand Rapids, Mich., writes:

Commenting on the telegrapher's strike, you say, "There is nothing to stand in the way of arbitration." There hardly ever is any obstacle save the stand of the employers that "we have nothing to arbitrate." It seems strange that we as a nation can interfere when other countries are at war, and induce them to arbitrate, but when arbitration would settle some of our own difficulties we seem to be powerless. We want peace conferences for other people but none for ourselves. It does not speak well for us as a Christian nation to let these useless warfares continue at home, to the detriment of all, when they could just as well be arbitrated.

C. M. L., U. S. S. Washington. Did the men with Saul when he had his vision hear the voice as stated Acts 9: 7, or did not hear it as stated Acts 22: 9?

This discrepancy is often pointed out. The most probable explanation is that they heard a sound, but could not understand what was said. It was to them inarticulate. It was something like the voice that spoke to Jesus (John 12: 28, 29.) The people heard that, but thought it was only thunder.

Reader, New York City. Wherein does the Jewish calendar differ from the Christian calendar?

The Jewish calendar dates from Anno Mundi, the "year of the world" (or creation), which they estimate to be 5668 years ago, while the Christian calendar dates from the birth of Christ (Anno Domini, or "year of our Lord").

E. D., ———. May I hope that in answer to prayer God will influence the heart of another person, or must that person pray himself before God will give the blessing?

There are many intercessory prayers in the Bible, such as II. Thes. 1: 11, which should encourage you to pray for the conversion of another person. No one is saved against his will, but God can influence the heart, drawing it to himself. The person must seek the blessing for himself, but he may be prompted and encouraged to do so by the Holy Spirit through your prayers.

Mr. C. H. Gibbons, Austin, Minn., writes:

In your issue of September 4, in your answer to the question of G. P., Valencia, Kan., as to whether "conscience is a safe guide," you say that Paul thought that he was doing God service in persecuting the Christians. I fail to find anything even suggesting this idea. Acts 26: 9 conveys the contrary. Paul was in service to the king and not to God.

See Acts 26: 9.

Monument to the late President McKinley, Recently Unveiled at Buffalo, N. Y.

ON September 5 the city of Buffalo dedicated an imposing obelisk, erected in Niagara Square, to the memory of President McKinley. It lacked but one day of the sixth anniversary of the tragedy that plunged the entire nation in sorrow. Just before the monument was unveiled, two thousand white "homing" pigeons were released in front of it, making a most beautiful sight. Bishop Walker, the mayor, and Governor Hughes took part in the exercises that followed an imposing military parade. The obelisk is of pure white marble, and eighty-six feet high. It rests on a pedestal fourteen feet high, the base itself being twelve feet above the street.

AUSTRALIA'S MARCH OF PROGRESS

WHAT OUR ANTIPODEAN FRIENDS ARE DOING FOR THE WORLD'S BETTERMENT

VE, have reached the antipodes in- dd, where winter es in July, and the weather grows colder as y go south, and the wind from that quarter s the work of our north wind, and labor, instead of capital, controls in politics. Australia is now sharing the most universal sperity the world at large has ever known. In many respects, labor has used ely its great powers in Australasia (by which we mean both Australia and New Zland). For example: New Zealand has become "a land without strikes," through t enactment of compulsory arbitration. It is claimed, however, that the same pn has not worked so well in New South Wales and West Australia, perhaps hause it has not yet had sufficient trial. The labor vote has established a mini- m living wage for certain trades, and wages boards, and a weekly half-holiday; t we found child labor as nowhere else in the ticket collectors of South Australia, o are all half-grown boys of fourteen or less, who ought to be at school and at y. Woman suffrage is another pre-eminence of Australia. Farther back is he Australian ballot," Australia's greatest distinction. We hear that the wives workingmen are more regular voters than society women. There have been ny legislative gains of late in laws relating to morals. These moral laws e an interesting study because the stralian States, only recently united a commonwealth, have extremely le interest in the Federal govern- nt as yet, and are emphatically in e States' rights period. Like a half- zen horses, racing side by side, the States are all stimulated to progress whatever moral gain is made by any e of them.

For example, stronger laws against mbling, which is the characteristic of Australia, have recently been acted in New South Wales and Vic- ria. The next State, South Australia, stimulated to like action, not only the desire of its good people not to outrun in any good thing, but by e fact that the street gamblers, ban- hed from the other two States, have ken refuge in Adelaide, where I rite, and have created such an increase f street betting that mounted police ere needed on last Saturday evening keep the way open for the street cars. his blocks reputable business also, and have just been with a strong depu- ation to the Labor Premier, who as a tone mason laid the cornerstone years go of the Parliament House in which e now rules, and he has assured us that e will at once introduce a law as good s that of the States whose dumping- round this has become. The anti- ambling laws of Australia, however, ome ludicrously short of the laws of most of our American States, in that no legislative effort has yet been made in Australia to suppress the chief gambling devil of all — the "totalizator," which is legalized in South Australia, Tasmania and New Zealand, as a means of race-track gambling. The smallest of Australian States, Tasmania, for a yearly bribe of $300,000 shelters a piratical agency for gambling, into which the people of Australia pour three millions of dollars a year — far more than all the world pours into Monte Carlo, which is a baby compared to Saratoga also. Except New York State, the most cursed of all commonwealths of the world by gambling, there are probably no States save California and Louisiana which can approach the Anglo-Saxon people of Australia in this vice. In Queensland, the minister of education dismisses schools when the annual race day comes, though he knows it will be chiefly a carnival of gambling. In South Australia the government furnishes the land for the track and takes a percentage of the profits of the infamous "totalizator." But so low is public sentiment on this point in an otherwise civilized State, that even reformers dare not ask that the totalisator or the government revenue from it shall be discontinued, and a legislator may be defeated if it is whispered about the polls, "He is an enemy of the totalizator."

A Street in Adelaide, Blocked With Gamblers

It will be surprising if preachers and Y. M. C. A. secretaries do not presently and persistently aid the anti-gambling campaign which Mr. W. H. Judkins, of Melbourne, editor of the Australian Review of Reviews, has been leading in Australia with such success that he has needed a bodyguard of twenty men to keep him from the knives of the gamblers' assassins. He is to prosecute this and other reforms hereafter as the Australian Secretary of the International Reform Bureau, whose newly organized Australian councils include many distinguished members, among them Sir Frederick Holder, speaker of the Commonwealth Parliament; Hon. Samuel Manger, of the Federal Cabinet, and many other men of prominence.

Australia's recent laws against opium are more adequate. Indeed, the United States may well hasten to follow its recent prohibition, at great cost of revenue, of all importation of opium, that we may no longer bear the shame of receiving at San Francisco, for the destruction of our Chinese residents, and many whites as well, all the opium manufactured by degraded Portuguese Macao, the "Monte Carlo of the East."

The legislative restrictions of liquor selling in Australia are very inadequate, but the changes are all for the better. New Zealand, among many wonderful recent achievements, has enacted a local

"LUSITANIA"—COLOSSUS OF THE SEA

The Passengers' "Writing Room" | Section of the Great Dining Rooms | The Inviting "Lounging Room"

ONE morning recently there steamed up the Narrows into New York harbor a large black vessel for which the lookouts on all ships at anchor and at various points of vantage on shore had been watching for several hours. No sooner was she sighted than the shores vibrated with welcoming salutes and cheers. From the iron frame of the new Singer Building a great banner was "broken out," on which was the word "welcome" in the international code. The ship was the Lusitania, of the Cunard Line, the largest ship ever built, which had just finished her first voyage from Great Britain to America.

Tugs soon puffed about her, and the American representative of the line went on board, followed by officials and newspaper men, to congratulate the officers on their successful trial trip. Shortly afterward the vessel transferred her passengers to smaller steamers to be taken ashore. She then steamed to her specially prepared dock.

When the Great Eastern made her first voyage across the Atlantic, nearly a generation ago, men thought that the limit of size in ship construction had been reached. As the ship was not a great success it was thought that smaller and more wieldy craft should be built. Lately, however, the size of the ocean steamships has been growing, until now the Great Eastern would appear small compared with the latest triumph of the shipbuilder's art, the Lusitania.

English-speaking people on both sides of the Atlantic watched the construction of the ship with much interest. To Great Britain the success of the vessel meant much. For years British liners have held the foremost place, but recently her supremacy has been threatened by other European countries. When the papers announced the time and day of the Lusitania's sailing, people came in from miles about Liverpool to the great docks along the river Mersey to see the ship start and cheer her on her way. For four miles on either bank they were massed many rows deep. Patiently they waited through the afternoon and early evening for the sight that would be one of the things they would tell their children's children.

The river had grown dusky, and it was well toward nine o'clock when the great black hull loomed out of the darkness, her ports gleaming like a hundred eyes and the four black funnels belching dense clouds of smoke high into the air. Larger and larger she seemed to grow, and the other ships in the river seemed to dwindle to the size of ferryboats and tenders. Two hundred feet in air the foremost pennant on the Lusitania snapped saucily in the evening breeze.

There was a moment's silence along the docks and then every engineer in the factories and on the steamboats at their moorings pulled his whistle cord. Now and then through this unearthly din could be heard the voices of the people as they shouted themselves hoarse.

The whistles ceased their tooting for a moment and the answering blasts of the Lusitania came across the water. Then a voice raised the first line of "Rule Britannia." As one man thousands took it up and sang it again and again, until the stern lights of the Lusitania twinkled for a moment and then disappeared far down toward the open sea.

The Lucania of the same line had held the record from Queenstown for speed for several years. She left Liverpool four hours before the Lusitania. The latter raced after, and within two days had passed her and left her far behind. Every day wireless messages were sent to shore giving the rate of speed at which the ship was traveling. It was not pushed until after the stop was made at Queenstown, Ireland. Then the stokers went to work with a will and the engines forced up the speed to twenty-three and one-half knots per hour. The officers kept her going steadily at this rate, though with little difficulty the ship could have been sent along two knots faster. The turbine engines worked without a hitch, and the passengers were not conscious of the least jar or vibration, something remarkable in engines that have not been keyed up by several trial runs.

The passengers were very anxious that the boat should exceed all previous records for speed, and crowds of them gathered around the bulletin boards whenever the record of the day's run was posted. Bursts of applause would come as it was realized that there might be a possibility of reaching Sandy Hook in less than five days, but they were destined te be disappointed. The ship was so steady that few of the passengers were seasick. Indeed, it was difficult for most of them to realize that they were on shipboard at all. Inside, the ship seemed more like a first-class hotel in one of our American cities. The ordinary ship furniture had been done away with, and in its plac were found luxurious lounges and handsome chairs beautiful paintings adorned the walls, and wood fir crackled cheerily in the marble fireplaces. Palms an flowers were growing in large set tubs. People passe from one deck to another by roomy elevators, whic were ready for service any hour in the twenty-fou Among the various attractions provided were a musi room, a nursery for the children, a game room, an lounging and reading rooms. The news of the day wa brought by wireless and published daily.

The vessel lacks but ten feet of being eight hundre feet long. She is eighty feet across the deck and eight feet in depth to the boat deck. Measured to the to of her four funnels, she is one hundred and fifty-five fe high, while the tops of her masts rake through the ai at two hundred and sixteen feet. The displacement i 45,000 tons. The ship is propelled by four screw rotated by turbine engines of 68,000 horse-power. Tha number of horses if placed in single file would exten ninety miles, and if lined up twenty abreast, there woul be 3,400 rows.

The ship would fill a very wide city street so tightly if placed lengthwise, that a person could hardly squeez by on either side. If she were slanted up the side of th great pyramid of Cheops, in Egypt, she would protrud far over the top into space. She would hold nearly fou Bunker Hill monuments placed end to end in her hold If the ship were back of the Capitol at Washington, th observer in front could see the bow and stern and th four funnels reaching up nearly to the top of the dome anchored under Brooklyn Bridge, she would reach hal way across from the stone piers. If the famous Flat iron Building, in New York City, were placed on it side by the ship's hull, it would not reach from the firs to the fourth smokestack. The Lusitania's time fro Queenstown to Sandy Hook was five days and fifty four minutes, the fastest record yet made betwee these two points. The Deutschland, however, holds th record for the fastest day's sailing from Europe, having covered 601 knots in twenty-four hours.

The White Star Line is planning for a bigger ship and a German firm will endeavor to lay the keel of on much larger within a short time.

source or power. Ours is the only flag that has in reality written upon it, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity;" and this great Republic was founded by true Bible believers.

This Book spread through England and inspired the revolt against Charles I. in 1642. Its "To your tents, O Israel!" quickened the Puritans into action, and its inspiration caused them to ride into battle singing its psalms. It was the Bible which lifted the peoples of Europe into a civilized condition and made nations of them.

All the beneficent changes in the world have occurred under the dominion of the Bible. The Reformation—one of the sublimest uprisings in the whole history of the human race, which developed the human mind, promoted civilization, liberalized men, destroyed in a measure superstition, revolutionized religious beliefs, and changed the forms of governments—was the outgrowth of the study of the Bible by Martin Luther under Nicholas de Lyra, the Jew.

Liberty, charity and brotherhood find their only place of abode in Bible countries. They thrive upon the Bible. Their sustenance is the Bible. They worship at its august shrine, and bow with imperial grandeur before its majestic throne.

This Book, which is our consoler in our sickness and when the fever of the world is on us, which tempers our grief, which enables us with a bright eye and without fear to take the death-angel by the hand, to tread the way through the dark valley, bidding farewell to wife and babes and home, in the consolation of meeting in gladness beyond the tomb; this Book, on which men rest their dearest hopes, and which tells us of earthly duties and inspires us with the hope of heavenly rest and heavenly reunion—for this precious Book we are indebted to the Jews.

Either an ignoramus or an ingrate then must that man be who despises or aids in ostracizing the race to which, under God, we are indebted for the inception and the preservation of that invaluable volume.

This precious Book I'd rather have than all the golden gems
That ere in monarchs' coffers shone, or in their diadems;
And were the sea one chrysolite, the earth a golden ball,
And gems were all the starsof night, this Book were worth them all.

In considering the Jew's advantage, we may look forward as well as backward. The Jew has a wonderful future before him. As the Apostle Paul said, "God is able to graft them in again" to the olive tree from which they have been broken off. Then he asks: "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be?" In that future time when "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. 11: 26); when they recognize "the Deliverer who shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob"; when they "look upon him whom they have pierced and mourn," what advantage will the Jew have then? Who can preach the Gospel as could the Jew? When he resumes the place he occupied through many centuries, as the spiritual guide and teacher of the world, and goes forth to preach the Gospel of the Cross, then shall we learn, in fuller measure than ever before, what advantage hath the Jew.

Evangelist Alexander AT THE Bowery Mission

Evangelist Alexander Leading the Singing at the Bowery Mission

THE visit of Mr. Charles M. Alexander to the Bowery Mission marked a red-letter day in the history of that famous old institution. He was accompanied by the sweet-voiced soloist, Mr. Virgo, and by Mr. Harkness, the accomplished Australian pianist who has contributed so largely to the success of the Torrey-Alexander meetings.

It was opening night at several of the Bowery theatres, and as the Mission stands almost opposite one famous theatre and an adjoining music hall, and is flanked on one side by another theatre, and on the other by floating saloons and moving-picture shows, the street crowd, ordinarily great, was, on this particular evening, phenomenal. It was through a surging mob of political-paraders and pleasure-seekers, with "bombs bursting in air," and the glare of the red light on their faces, that the three evangelists pushed their way to the old Gospel lighthouse.

The Mission hall was crowded to excess. Only a small proportion of Mr. Alexander's uptown friends could find seats, standing room or even admission. It was a typical Bowery crowd that the great singer was called upon to face—as curious a compound of human misery and need as was ever packed together on ten thousand square feet of space. There were the poor old "down-and-outs," waiting pathetically for the end to come, and the young prodigals with the wan faces and tearful eyes whenever home or mother was mentioned; there were bloated drunkards, skilful crooks, dangerous "yeggmen"; there were men who, unless their hearts were touched by the grace of God during the meeting, would, before morning, add one more to the long list of crimes already catalogued against them. And there were also in that crowd some of God's truest heroes, fighting an uphill battle against inward passion and outward circumstance, day after day, night after night, fighting, and, by the help of God, "winning out."

They were all hungering to see and hear the wonderful man who, they had been told, had sung more souls into the kingdom of God, with the possible exception of Ira D. Sankey, than any other man of our day.

It did not take Mr. Alexander two minutes to demonstrate his unrivaled genius as a leader of a meeting and a congregational precentor. He was on his feet for over two hours, and when he was not singing or leading in song, he was giving utterance to the great fundamental truths of Christianity in a manner that kept his audience

The Future of the Philippines

ON the assumption—which is probably a reasonable one, all things considered—that our occupancy of the Philippines has been a disappointment, many of our leading journals are agitating the question whether we should not make an effort, at some early date, to relieve ourselves of our costly colonial possession. It is pointed out by some of these advocates of such a course, that the islands have already cost us an outlay of between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000, and that the natives are as inflexibly opposed to American rule as they were on the first day of annexation. They are still far from having reached the stage of development which fits them for self-government, even if we were disposed to grant it.

Since the Filipinos cannot hope to become an independent people forthwith, the only alternative that seems to occur to these critics of the situation is that the islands must be sold. And if sold, to whom? "To Spain," suggests some one, "as she was the original owner and the language and customs are Spanish." But it is doubtful if Spain wants them, or could pay for them, even if she did. Germany has enough colonial projects on hand at present in South Africa and elsewhere; France, remembering Algeria and the Moroccan troubles, would hesitate to embark in new colonial ventures; even Great Britain seems to be satisfied with her present burden of responsibility in the uplifting of the "sullen alien races." Japan, for many reasons, is out of the question, and, strangely enough, the native sentiment in the archipelago, it is said, is strongly tinctured with anti-Japanese feeling. The question therefore repeats itself: "What shall be done with the Philippines?"

Since the time is evidently inopportune, either for the sale or independence of these islands, it would seem to be advisable to look in another quarter for their ultimate disposition. We believe that if this government does its whole duty toward the Filipinos, honestly and faithfully, and does not shrink from any of the moral and political responsibilities which the possession of the islands imposes, the problem will ultimately solve itself to our satisfaction. As a Higher Power entrusted the Philippines to our keeping, we cannot throw them aside at will. We are, in the largest sense, responsible for their development on modern civilized lines, just as other nations are responsible for the social, political, moral and commercial education of their dependent colonies. To throw down the task and acknowledge it one wholly beyond our skill, would be something quite foreign to the American sense of self-respect.

On the whole, it is not a question of national finance, nor one of inclination, but of duty. If we have been chosen to play the part of providence to the Filipinos, let us continue to do it faithfully and well. Let us try the effect of liberal laws and generous commercial regulations. Let us, by means of education and the Gospel, lead them to a higher plane of life than they have yet been able to reach. Let us strive to give them a glimpse of the possibilities in store for them as a people, when they have passed the period of turbulence, and have begun to reason out their own destiny. It is evident that they are yet far from being fitted for self-government. To abandon them now would in all likelihood be equivalent to thrusting them back into the unenlightened gloom in which these islanders and their forefathers have lived for centuries past. To give them over to certain Powers, would be a set-back to human progress and enlightenment that would be felt throughout the civilized world.

The Southern Temperance Movement

SWIFTLY and surely the Southern half of the country is forcing the liquor business to the wall, and the results are already being seen in fewer crimes, fewer paupers and increased business for the small storekeepers. For several years the forces of prohibition have been gathering strength, but it was not until the recent victory in Georgia that the rest of the country realized what could be done when the better elements of a community banded together to repress the force that has proved the greatest enemy of the common good.

Georgia had tried local option by counties and with success. But the "dry counties" found that the "wet counties" sent liquor over their boundary lines, and the temperance people determined on a great effort to do away with the liquor traffic altogether.

The account of the passage of the bill that killed the saloon was given in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The movement is strong in other States. Seventy counties out of seventy-six in the State of Mississippi are dry, and within a year there can be no doubt that the State will prohibit entirely the sale of liquor. The new State made from Indian Territory is for prohibition of the traffic. Arkansas has many "dry counties," and the majority of the members of the Alabama legislature are temperance men and the State is expected soon to stand in the temperance column. South Carolina has abolished its famous dispensary and the people expect that both South and North Carolina will follow the example of Georgia. In fact, even the advocates of the liquor interests have no hope that those States will turn back from their steady movement toward prohibition. Tennessee and Kentucky have taken a firm stand against the saloon. Knoxville, Tenn., is a prohibition city. In the days of the saloon it had a population of 35,000, and its criminal costs were $50,074.76. Now it has a population of 50,000 and the criminal costs have gone down to $2,076.21, a sufficient answer to those who put forward the absurd claim that a city needs the saloon to help pay taxes and make it prosperous.

The above gives but a general idea of the great movement in the South, a movement that it is hoped will spread to other sections of the country. The South should be proud of the temperance record it is making, and West and North should fall into line. Religion, public morals, science and business demand that the saloon shall cease to be a source of degradation to the present generation and a menace to the one that is growing up.

Hostility to the Missionary

EVERY one familiar with the story of American missions in the Caroline and Marshall Islands will deplore the withdrawal of the missionaries. They have been doing a most useful and successful work there for more than fifty years, and their converts are among the most intelligent natives on the islands. The German government, however, has manifested a spirit of intolerance and jealousy ever since it acquired the islands in 1899, and has at last made the situation unbearable for the missionaries. The American Board has therefore decided to abandon the field in the interests of peace, and has arranged with an evangelical organization in Germany to take over the work. It is supposed that the German government will scarcely venture to quarrel with missionaries who are German subjects.

A similar trouble has developed in Natal, where the British governor has conceived a hostile spirit toward the American missionary. It is now seventy years since the American mission was established in that country, and there have been few fields on which more devoted and self-sacrificing labor has been bestowed. The results, too, have been extraordinary. The Zulus in Natal have proved under missionary training faithful and consistent, and have manifested a noble and courageous spirit in the face of opposition. They have also proved themselves exceptionally able teachers and preachers, and have given valuable aid to the missionaries in extending the knowledge of Christianity among their people. The excuse of the governor for his hostility is that among the Zulus who made an insurrection recently there were found some who had been under the instruction of American missionaries.

The basis of the quarrel seems to be identical in both cases. The official mind is dense and prejudiced, whether it be German or English. As the New York Evening Post justly says: The government officials are quite willing "that the missionary shall explore virgin country; shall compile grammars and dictionaries to aid them in communicating with the natives; shall teach cleanliness and sanitation, and shall establish hospitals and orphanages; but after that work is done the missionary can be dispensed with, and is invited to step aside." He is inconvenient, too, as he may protest against hut-taxes, forced labor and judicial floggings. The ingratitude of such a course of treatment is obvious, and we believe in the case of Natal it will surely arouse among English Christians such a storm of protest that the most pachydermatous cabinet will have to interfere for the support of the missionaries.

The "Lusitania"

IT was surely a happy coincidence that the same year which witnessed the centenary celebration of the voyage of the world's first successful steamship, the little Clermont, should also have seen the arrival in New York waters of the greatest steamship human skill has yet constructed, the colossal Lusitania. Robert Fulton's tiny craft of 130 feet length and sixteen feet beam, wou have looked like a skiff alongside the gigantic 790-fo Cunarder, whose 68,000 horse-power turbines had drive her through the Atlantic amid fog and storm, at th rate of twenty-three knots (or about twenty-six mile per hour, many times the speed of the Clermont, who first trip of 110 miles on the placid Hudson occupie twenty-four hours.

Although stress of weather prevented the Lusitan from winning the proud title of "Queen of the Seas, which still belongs to the fleet German liner Deutschlan the mammoth turbine may yet be expected to lower a records when her great engines get to working smoothl and in proper "tune." As it was, she made the recor trip from Queenstown to Sandy Hook.

The Lusitania marks the world's rapid progress i navigation. Thirty or forty years ago, the bulky ol sailing liners were still afloat, making Atlantic voyage in from twenty to forty days, while the best steamer then in commission seldom did better than fifteen days But the time schedule across the ocean ferry was cu down year by year, by the sharp competition of the riva companies in the American trade. Many of our reader can recall the successive triumphs of the "greyhounds o the sea," when the schedule was reduced to twelve, ten and eight days. When the first six-day trip wa achieved, it was believed that the climax had bee reached, and that the highest marine engineering skil could do no more. The coming of the turbine, however is apparently destined to revolutionize ocean travel, and the new liner has already shown us that four-day steamships will soon be the rule in the Atlantic passenger fleet

At the present time, Europe is proudly wearing the honors of the merchant marine. Let us hope that Ameri can enterprise and ingenuity may soon succeed in pushing our own shipping to the front. We cannot afford to be behind in the great struggle for results that add to the speed, safety, comfort and enjoyment of the constantly increasing multitude of transatlantic travelers.

His address made a great impression, and resulted in extended discussion of the subject.

—THE CORNER-STONE of the new Presbyterian Chinese Mission, in the very heart of old Chinatown, San Francisco, Cal., has very recently been laid with simple and yet impressive ceremonies. It stands on the site of the old Presbyterian Church. The corner-stone was laid by Fong Doon, the oldest living convert to Christianity in the United States. The services were under the direction of Rev. J. H. Laughlin, superintendent of Chinese Missions, and pastor of the Mission Church, and was attended by many Chinese.

The Race Riots at Vancouver

SERIOUS race riots similar to those at San Francisco are causing international complications. On Saturday, September 7, an attack was made on the Chinese quarter at Vancouver, B. C., in which property estimated to be worth $5,000 was destroyed and two thousand Chinamen had to flee for their lives. This attack was followed later in the evening by one on the Japanese hotels and stores, in which fifty-six establishments suffered. The Japanese did not submit tamely, as did the Chinese, but fought with sticks and knives in defense of their property. Coincident with the riot a steamer arrived, on which were over twelve hundred Asiatics, chiefly Hindus. This arrival exasperated the labor organizations and there was a vigorous effort to prevent their being landed. About a dozen Japanese were thrown into the water, but were afterwards rescued. The Mayor notified the captain that the city could not be responsible for a safe landing; he therefore carried his passengers to Victoria. A renewal of the rioting was feared, but the Japanese obtained weapons from the local gun-stores and declared they would repel any attack made upon them. They summoned their countrymen from their work in private families, restaurants and factories to aid in the defense. The police promptly closed the gun-stores when they discovered that the Japanese were arming, but not until the stocks were almost exhausted. It is feared that the trouble is by no means over, as the Canadian Parliament has recently endorsed the treaty guaranteeing safety to Canadians and Japanese in their respective countries. A bill restricting Asiatic immigration on the principle of that in force in Natal was subsequently passed, but was vetoed by the governor. It is asserted by Sir Charles Tupper, who has made a personal investigation, that the leaders of the rioters are not chiefly Canadians, but are themselves men of foreign extraction, who have settled in British Columbia. At present, the Japanese Government and press show no indication of excitement over the riot, feeling sure that the Canadian Government will do all in its power to protect the Japanese settlers. The trouble appears to have arisen not so much from dislike of the Asiatics as such, as from the fear that their cheap labor will be used as a substitute for white labor. The logical remedy is not in such violence as this, but in a change in the law regulating the extent of alien immigration. The advice of the town clerk of Ephesus may be commended to the workmen of Vancouver:

The law is open: . . . if ye inquire anything it shall be determined in a lawful assembly: for we are in danger to be called in question for this day's uproar. (Acts 19: 38–40.)

Killed in Saving a Train

A pathetic death occurred near Pittsburg, Pa., recently when miscreants had removed the spikes and fishplates from a section of the track of the Pennsylvania Railroad. A trackwalker who had been set to patrol that section of the line made the discovery, and remembered that the Chicago Limited was almost due. With the tools he carried he replaced the spikes, and bolted the fishplates securely. The time passed more rapidly than he realized while he was busy with the work. He was just fixing the last bolt when the express rounded the curve. A train was coming in the opposite direction, and it is supposed that the trackwalker thought that it was responsible for the noise he heard, which unhappily was the onrushing express. It struck him as he was bending over his work, and threw him down the embankment. He was speedily carried to the nearest hospital, but he died that night. He had saved the lives of more than a hundred passengers, but it was at the cost of his own. His concern about saving others caused him to neglect his own safety. It was a noble and pathetic death. Many will praise him for his self-sacrifice who forget that the whole race owes its hope of eternal life to such a death, consciously and intentionally incurred.

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27: 42.)

No Transitory Immigration

The congressional commission which has been making an investigation of conditions in European countries from which the bulk of our immigrants come, has returned to the United States. The members have gathered important information which is likely to prove useful in framing an immigration law. They agree that in all lands emigration to America in such vast numbers as in recent years is deplored. Most of the emigrants are of the agricultural class, and their coming has caused a scarcity of farm labor at home. The governments in which conscription prevails, and even those in which the army is recruited by voluntary enlistment, regret the loss of strong, brawny soldiers. On the other hand, there is rejoicing, in which our own country has no reason to share, that the emigrant frequently sends home a large part of his earnings, which habit is highly appreciated. Besides this, the emigrant, especially if he comes from Italy, Austria or the Balkan States, looks forward to the time when he will return with a modest fortune on which to live during the remainder of his life. The commission will make it a prominent feature of advice as to the new legislation, that regulations be adopted designed to prevent the admission of immigrants who do not intend to remain here permanently. The Christian church has a similar need. None should enter it who do not intend, with God's help, to remain in it.

No man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God. (Luke 9: 62.)

Exploration in Tibet

Another failure is reported in the attempt to thoroughly explore the recesses of Tibet. Dr. A. Tafel, a German traveler who has made it the chief purpose of his life to study the valley of the Brahmaputra and the adjacent districts, announces that he has again failed to enter it. This is the twentieth effort that has been made during the past seventeen years. He is greatly disappointed, for he felt sure that this time he would succeed, as he had the co-operation of some of the leading Tibetans in the southeastern part of the country, and they had supplied a small force of men who promised to stand by him. But when Tafel approached the threshold of the unknown, his men, terrorized by the tales of the cruelty and atrocities of the natives who inhabit the deep and gloomy valley through which the Brahmaputra descends like a millrace to the plains of India, called a halt, and all the appeals of the explorer could not make them budge a step further. Dr. Tafel had to go back and take the Rockhill route into China. The advantages of opening up the country are fully described in his narrative. He mentions incidentally, as an example, that in the district the cocoanut is regarded as the best of food and the most potent of medicines, and is being sold to the people at a price equivalent to eight dollars each. When it is remembered how cheaply it might be obtained in the islands of the Pacific and conveyed to Tibet, the advantage to seller and buyer is obvious. It may be hoped that other advantages besides that of buying cheap cocoanuts would come to the inhabitants from opening up that region. They need to hear the proclamation of the Truth, which is better than any commercial advantage.

To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and inheritance among them that are sanctified. (Acts 26: 18.)

Mars Inhabited

An authoritative statement has been issued by Professor Lowell, of the results of his observation of our nearest planetary neighbor. He obtained a number of excellent photographs during the opposition, and these are being carefully studied under the microscope. The observation has convinced him that the planet is the abode of intelligent, constructive life, and no other supposition is consonant with all the facts he observed. At the beginning of his observation the southern regions of the planet were covered with a dense white cap, which he presumes to have been snow and ice. As this melted, the famous canals, of which he counted fifty-six, became clearly defined, and from them smaller canals branched at regular intervals. The arid regions blossomed into life as the canals exhausted themselves, and Professor Lowell is convinced that vegetation rapidly developed. As the southern snow cap gradually disappeared, the northern polar region was more extensively covered, which in its turn will feed the canals running from it to the planet's equator. The Professor's theory is that Mars is without water except as it is gathered in this way from the melting snows at the poles. He believes that the canals are vast works constructed by the inhabitants to save themselves from perishing. The English astronomers, however, do not think that the observations warrant the deduction, and Alfred Russel Wallace, who wrote some time ago to prove that this earth is the only one having inhabitants, characteristically remarks: "My own opinions are unchanged." When men so learned disagree, the layman may well hesitate in forming or expressing his opinion. It seems reasonable, however, to think that the worlds that glitter in the heavens were not made merely as a spectacle, but as a habitation for conscious beings. Who knows whether among them may be the one He has gone to prepare for his people?

In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you. (John 14: 2.)

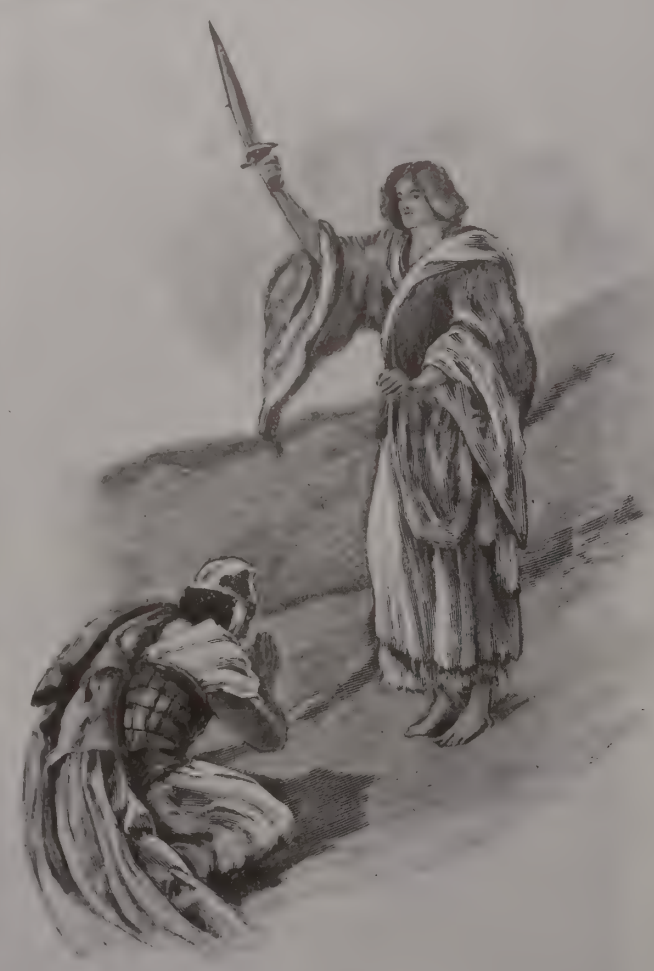
JOSHUA, A TWO-SWORD MAN

*International Sunday School Lesson for October 6, 1907, by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

A GREAT scene is Joshua's first meeting with his divine Commander-in-chief when he had become the successor of Moses as leader of the host of Israel. As God was wont to speak with Moses, so now he would speak with Joshua. For such talks with God Moses had usually gone to the tent of meeting, the Tabernacle, and God had spoken to him there out of the cloudy, fiery pillar. Joshua may have gone there, or the Lord may have met him in his own tent. Joshua receives the charge that he is to go forward and capture the Promised Land. It is not a strange country to Joshua, for he was one of the twelve men who were sent to spy out the land forty years before. He has a vivid recollection of the difficulties to be overcome in conquering the inhabitants. He has also a stout heart, as he had then. He is now eighty-three years of age, but his faith is not dimmed, nor his spiritual force abated.



"Behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword in his hand"

The whole land is spread out as a map before his vision as God directs his attention to the wilderness in the south; "this Lebanon and the great River Euphrates" on the north; to the land of the Hittites on east; to the Mediterranean Sea on the west. So much is to be his battle-ground; so much Israel's possession so far as they will capture it by divine aid. And God promises that he himself will be Joshua's ally. "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee." And victory is assured even before the campaign begins. "There shall not a man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

Required to Be Brave

But Joshua is expected to do his part well. His Commander charges him: "Be strong, and of a good courage." There must be faithful and loyal allegiance rendered by him to God: "Observe to do according to all the law which Moses my servant commanded thee." Only so could Joshua expect those who were under him to be obedient to his commands, for only those who control themselves can expect to control others. God also charged Joshua to be a diligent and well-informed leader, and so named a book which he urged Joshua to read day and night, and to think earnestly about what he had read, and to make that book a part of his very life, so that its words should be his chart in the guidance of his people. It was to be his supreme book of tactics. That book was "the book of the law," the first five books of our Bible—all that had then been written. And then the charge was given to him in ringing, authoritative tones: "Have not I commanded thee?" Joshua seemed to be clothed with the whole armor of God, as his commander further said to him: "Jehovah thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest."

Prompt Obedience

Joshua, with soldierly promptness, entered upon the campaign laid upon him. He passed through the tents among his people, and told them to be ready in three days to march forward. And the people were loyal and true, and promised that they would follow him as they had followed Moses, and themselves suggested that any who should rebel against him should be put to death. He wisely sent scouts ahead, so that there should be no unexpected difficulties. So Israel's new leader entered upon his work encouraged by God and by his people.

"The Lord spake unto Joshua." In the second volume of Stanley's Darkest Africa, he tells us that when it was indeed darkest in his difficult expedition, searching for Livingstone and exploring African jungles; when he seemed to have encountered insurmountable difficulties and began to feel he must retreat and confess defeat in his arduous undertaking, he turned to his Bible almost in despair and providentially opened to the first chapter of Joshua, which he read as a message of God to himself. Read the lesson right here and see what cheer it brought to the almost baffled leader. Thus encouraged, he went forward, never again hesitating until his work was done. This story should be told whenever this chapter is assigned as a lesson, to remind us that God still speaks to men through fresh applications of his written word.

"Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise!" When one in the front rank of God's army falls, the right thing to do is not to drop out of the ranks for idle mourning, but to step forward to fill the vacant place so far as possible. That is the best honor to the dead—to carry forward his work and God's work. In Westminster Abbey, on a marble tablet containing the medallion portraits of John and Charles Wesley, is the motto, yet more appropriate to the case of Moses and Joshua: "God buries his workers, but carries on his work." World-wide Methodism verifies that motto. Joshua was by no means so great as Moses, but God still lived, who works his will by great and small. Here is our encouragement, that when the illustrious fall, even our commonplace talents may be multiplied by omnipotence to continue and complete the task.

"Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given you." Here is a profound principle of wide application. God gives capacity, but we must develop character. God gives opportunity, but achievement waits on human will. The state or the parent provides a school, but only by the pupil's own diligent efforts can he get education. The gymnasium is there, but only so much of it as we set foot or hand upon becomes exercise and development to us. The father sets his boy up in business, but only by his own faithful efforts can he achieve success in it. God gave Israel all the land from Hamath to the Euphrates on the north and east, to the River of Egypt on the south. To Abraham, to Moses, to Joshua, were these

Boundaries Specified

But Israel, under Joshua, halted its campaign when only one-third of the Land of Promise in the land was possessed. All this is an instructive parallel of what is happening in the Church to-day. We seldom possess more than one-third of the graces and blessings set before us in the "exceeding great and precious promises," which offer us deliverance, not only from the guilt of sin but from the power of it, and from the very love of it, and Pentecostal power for service. Every promise that the sole of your foot shall tread upon in conquest and appropriation, that God has given you.

Mr. Alex. F. Irvine tells in Men of one before whom a Land of Promise was opened, who, by a single false step, barred himself out forever. A carpenter named Tesson was employed by Millet, the painter, to mount his canvases. Millet was but a peasant, and the carpenter felt that he too might paint as well, or better, and he made some pictures that a friend mistook for works of Millet. "They are my own," said Tesson. "Well," said his friend, "they are just like his, and just as good; and if you are hard up at any time you can just sign his name on them and get a neat sum." When Tesson was in sore need of money the tempting words came back. He painted "J. F. Millet"' on three of his own pic[t]s. Then he blotted it out. Ten times he signed and e[r]d, but at last the tempter won and the pictures were d. Tesson was detected and imprisoned for forgery. [Y]en he came out of jail he tried to paint in his own n[a]e. The pictures were good enough, but no one wante[d] he work of a forger. All he could do to eke out his in[come] was to sell little marine views to tourists at a franc[e]. Once he went to Paris to begin anew where he wa[s] known. "I could not get away from myself," w[as] explanation of his tragic failure. In his dreary st[u]dio friend saw a copper-plate representing a man sta[n]ding in an attitude of indecision; outside the fast closed [door] stood an angel. "The angel came once," he said, 'I would not open. She returns not. Her name is [Op]portunity." Next to the sadness of opportunities w[ho]lly lost is that of opportunities not half improved, [as] Israel's in the days of Joshua.

God's Invincibles

"There shall not any man be able to stand b[e]fore thee." All through the pages of history we call the [roll] of God's invincibles, men who forget themselves, [and] carry all before them because they are linked to [the] omnipotence of God by a faith that casts out fear.

> All good things await > Him who cares not to be great
> But as he saves and serves the State.

It is impossible to explain the world-wide influen[ce] of such men as Moses and Paul, Luther and Knox wit[h]out seeing God's resistless providence in the backgroun[d] of their superhuman work. And the lowliest is also p[ri]leged to say, "All things are possible to him [that] believeth." Humility says: "I am not able;" but F[ai]th answers: "He is able." "I can do all things thro[ugh] Christ that strengtheneth me."

"Be strong and of a good courage."(verses 6, 7, 9, [18]) Three times God bids Joshua to be of good courage, [and] the people also come with encouragement, all of w[hich] brings encouragement to our timid souls by showing [how] human he must have been to need so much encoura[ge]ment. It also suggests that when Christian men [are] undertaking hard tasks for God and man, we should [not] assume it is enough that they can, like David, enc[our]age themselves in God; let us also give them a ch[eer]. Dr. H. W. Mabie once introduced Mark Twain as An[er]ica's great cheerupadist. "It is good to be cheerful a[gainst] adverse circumstances, but it is far more to be co[ur]geously aggressive in battling against entrenched wro[ng].

FAMILY LIVING ON $500 A YEAR

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

More Letters on Home Economy

ECONOMICAL home management still has the right of way in the correspondence that comes to this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The frank comparison of views cannot fail to be suggestive and helpful, and while the subject continues to be of paramount interest we shall publish letters from our friends. As yet no prize has been assigned, the letters received being so nearly equal in merit that choice among them is difficult.

The Experience of Vegetarians

Can a married couple live on five hundred dollars a year? We answer from experience, yes. We accumulated enough in six years to purchase a home in the country. My wife laid by the whole amount from her salary as a teacher before our marriage. We are economical, but not stingy. We never waste food nor anything else. A few years after marriage we lost everything by fire, except a small insurance. We rebuilt, but incurred a debt of fifteen hundred dollars, which we are canceling at the rate of one hundred a year, so our cash income has never been more than five hundred dollars annually.

How do we do it? By living hygienically, practising economy and avoiding debt. We are vegetarians, and consider farinaceous food, fresh fruits and vegetables are more nourishing than meat. Our drink is pure cold water. Consequently we are never sick and have no doctor's bills to pay.

We never ran into debt except for our little home. We give freely to the church and for missions. We take a number of periodicals, have a free private library, and seek to cultivate the mind as well as the body.

We practise the same economy in dress. Our wedding suits are not yet shabby. If our income were ten times as much as it is now, we should not increase our living expenses. F. J. T.

A Leaf From the Life of a Wife and Mother

I think we spent less than five hundred dollars the first year. Husband had three ponies, a plow, wagon and saddle, a house twelve by fourteen feet, a cook stove, bed and cupboard, and a lease on a quarter of school land when we married, twelve years ago. His parents loaned us a cow and table, etc. With money that was a wedding present we bought a clock and flat-irons, which we still keep and use. So we spent very little to start to housekeeping. His folks gave us fifteen hens and one rooster, so we sold a few eggs.

Husband had broken out thirteen acres the year before, and had raised cotton, for which he got only from three to six cents a pound. He had also raised about twelve bushels of sweet potatoes, which we enjoyed eating. To break the land we had to pay four dollars per acre and board two men, so it went slowly.

Mother had given me a set of dishes and a barrel of canned fruit, which was quite a help to us in this new country.

The first year a little boy came to make his home with us. Then fourteen months later another boy came, and fifteen months later a girl came. They all stayed and are well and happy to-day. Before the first was born we added another room, twelve by twelve feet, to our house. We had a certain store to trade with, and went in debt only for what we had to have. Our bill, I think, never got over thirty dollars, and we settled two or three times a year, just as we could sell cotton, corn or hogs.

Husband's father sometimes gave us five or ten dollars at a time, and it went a long way, too. He also furnished us flour. We kept a strict account of all such, and later, when the estate was divided, knew how much we had had.

After five years' hard work, and spending five hundred dollars on the place in breaking sod, fencing, and wells and orchard, we sold our interest for three hundred dollars and drifted to town. We wanted a home. We took what we could get—a two-room house and one lot—the only thing we could trade a team for as part pay. The rest we paid at ten dollars a month until it was paid. We finally paid for it by saving. Husband did hauling, then got to be yardman in the lumber yard. Then we moved again. We had saved a little, and the estate helped us to build a three-room house. We rented our other house, as there was no sale then. Four years ago we sold both, and built a four-room house here. Husband here is manager of a yard and gets fifty dollars a month and ten per cent. commission.

Three years ago a little boy came and a year later a girl came. With the five children to feed and clothe, I think we do well to lay up anything. Though we are out of debt and have a little for the rainy days, we never make a debt unless we are sure of a way out, and have never failed to pay a debt yet. We have a cow and chickens, we sell eggs and make all our butter. The three children never miss a day of school or Sunday School. We hope to give them all a good education. Husband never used tobacco or liquor. Good health and good management helped us through.

About Answering Letters

The best time to answer a letter if it arrives in the morning, is the afternoon of the same day. When first one reads a letter, there is a responsive glow in the heart that makes a reply easy and conversational. The friend's letter is not very different from the friend's speech. It gives you fresh interest in her and in what is happening at home or in her circle, and immediately there is a desire to send her something worth while in return. Lay the letter in your desk to be attended to at a more convenient season, and there is a strong probability that you will find a dearth in your mind when you sit down to the task of correspondence. The letter, having grown cold, does not kindle a flame of love and desire in your heart, as would have been the case if promptly answered.

Letters of invitation or business letters should never be neglected or replies postponed. It is to the last degree discourteous to defer a reply to an invitation which has appended the letters r.s.v.p., meaning, Please answer. If a dinner invitation be accepted, it cannot later be declined, unless there be a valid excuse, such as extreme illness in one's own person, or a death in the family. Invitations to At Homes and Afternoon Teas, if informal, do not require a reply, but if one does not attend, one must send her visiting card so that it will arrive on the day of the reception.

Cheerful Mothers

ILL-TEMPER and melancholy are twins. Mothers should guard themselves against moroseness and anger, not only for their own sake, but because the mother's mood makes the substance or the shadow of the household. Children suffer unspeakably when the mother is habitually cross and fretful, when they cannot trust her to forgive their errors, and to pardon them for accidents that they could not help.

A home that is forever under the cloud of the mother's displeasure is a place from which growing boys and girls flee as if it were a prison. Homes are not penitentiaries, nor should they ever degenerate into reformatories. They should be so sweet and sunny that no thought of reformation need be associated in the thought of them. The boy and the girl to whom home is dear from the outset of life, to whom mother is a guardian angel of cheer and goodness, are well started on life's thorny road.

No doubt it is not easy for a mother to be always good tempered when she is overworked or half sick or encumbered with anxiety about ways and means. Nevertheless, she should try with God's help to rise above her fettering moods and harassing cares. In a very entertaining book by M. E. Waller, entitled A Daughter of the Rich, there is the portrait lovingly drawn of a mother whose struggle with difficult circumstances, small means and the raising of a large family went on for years. Mary Blossom managed her life so beautifully that her home was a real type of heaven and her children came to her with confidence in every emergency. A little motherless daughter from the home of a millionaire found in this sweet woman a second mother. Can we not imitate this pattern of good cheer?

Concerning Headgear

A man's hat is a simple affair. It varies in fashion, of course, having now a wide and now a narrow brim, being of straw or felt as the season indicates, and being encumbered with no superfluous trimming. The civilian's hat is not decorative, and whether it cover the bald head of middle age or the thick thatch of youth, it is just a hat, indispensable to its owner, admirably adapted for service and a splendid adjunct to politeness. The man who has never learned to take off his hat with grace in the presence of ladies and in compliment to friends, has missed an important part of education. When one dismisses a man's hat with the brevity essential to so ordinary a feature of wearing apparel and looks at the feminine headgear of the day, a new field is entered. A woman's bonnet or hat is the coronation of her costume. When a woman is young and pretty, when she still has the soft bloom and unfettered grace of girlhood, almost any hat suits her fresh complexion and her dainty sweetness. Older women should choose hats with a good deal of care; they should suit the shape of the head. A head may be long or round, small or large, may have plenty of hair or very little. The style of the head should determine the style of the hat. A woman who can make her own hats, in whom is the artistic gift of twisting a ribbon and setting a flower so that the hat may be a marvel of elegance and yet cost little money, is the envy of all her friends. It seems a pity that women in general should forget that the art of millinery is as picturesque, and, on the whole, as remunerative, as the art of illustrating books or painting pictures.

If a youth of seventeen and a girl of the same age are fellow students in the high school and are acquainted with one another, there is no reason why they should not occasionally walk together in going to and from school. It would not be precisely right for them to single each other out and always go in company. Neither should they avoid each other when they happen to meet.

GABRIELLE

THE FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE

By ISABELLA MACFARLANE

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Rebuffed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover. Again Captain Girard comes, and this time asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him her heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the de Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exception of Gabrielle escape to the ship. Gabrielle is secreted in a bale of linen, and sent in a cart to the seashore, where a boat is to meet her. She falls out, and the driver discovers he has had a Huguenot as a passenger. Gabrielle tries to escape, and is captured and taken to a convent. The nuns try to convert her. Late at night she wrenches the bars from her window and escapes to the shore. She finds a fisherman waiting with his boat. He rows her to the ship, and proves to be Captain Girard in disguise. He wishes to go with her, but she sends him back to his duty. He is arrested on his return and sent to the galleys. In the galleys he is placed next to Louis Marquand, and they become firm friends, not knowing they are rivals. They are transported as slaves to a West Indian island. After six months Girard receives news of his pardon. Meanwhile the Huguenots found New Rochelle in America. David Bonnefoy becomes a fur trader. He makes a journey to Albany to see his agent, taking Gabrielle with him. The agent's son had become her admirer. While stopping at the inn, some young men injure the lover of Elizabeth, the daughter of the landlord, while they are endeavoring to rob the hen roost.

WHEN Gabrielle and her father reached the inn, the injured man was so far recovered as to be able to walk. He was a young man of good figure and prepossessing appearance, and his velvet coat, lace ruffles, and silver shoe-buckles betokened affluence. But having bled profusely from the mouth and nose, his face was so smeared with blood as to be unrecognizable.

Well would it have been for him had it remained so. For on the application of a little water by the kind hands of Mistress Van Dusen, there were revealed to the landlord the well known features of his intended son-in-law; while David de Bonnefoy and his daughter, to their amazement, recognized in the crestfallen and miserable being the spruce supercargo of the fur-laden sloops, Guisebert Van Brunt!

Wolfert Van Dusen was thunderstruck. Nay, more—he was grieved, wounded, but to the heart. That his intended son-in-law should have conspired with a set of wild fellows to rob his hen-roosts—that he should have presumed to make him, Wolfert Van Dusen, the object of a "chicken frolic"—that he should (worst of all) have failed in the attempt, and been ignominiously exposed before all the neighbors—and travelers from New York as well—Oh! it was too much!

Being a man of prompt action, he strode up to the shame-struck young man, and seizing him by the shoulders, pushed him towards the door.

"Get out of my house, Guisebert Van Brunt! and never again darken my doors! Hence! Home with you!"

With these words, which might have been addressed to a dog, he thrust out Guisebert, who muttered something about having been led away by his companions—to which the angry landlord paid no heed.

But rough as was this usage, it was as nothing compared with the shame and humiliation felt by the gay Lothario on meeting the scornful glance of Gabrielle's eyes; while her father laughed outright, and made him a mocking bow.

Turning back into the kitchen, Wolfert observed his daughter leaning, pale and agitated, on her mother's arm, and Philip standing beside her. As he contrasted the open, manly front of Philip with the hang-dog look of the detected chicken-stealer, he felt in his heart that he had done wrong to come between his daughter and the man of her choice.

"Philip Van Buskirk," said he, "it is to you that I owe the preservation of my property this night, and I thank you heartily for it. I thank you, too, for the discovery I have made of Guisebert Van Brunt's true character. A rascal! a scamp! with his revels and his chicken frolics! But there is one thing I should like to have explained, Elisabeth," turning to her: "How came Philip, whom I had forbidden in the house, to be on the spot at midnight, just in the nick of time?"

Elisabeth hung her head. Her cheeks flushed scarlet. She made no reply. But Philip stepped boldly forward.

"It is true that you had forbidden your daughter and me to meet. But love is stronger than a father's commands. We were dying to see each other, and I persuaded Elisabeth to admit me after you had retired. The fault was entirely mine, if any fault there was in the matter."

And Philip took the girl's hand, and drew it lovingly and protectingly within his arm.

"No," said Wolfert Van Dusen, "the fault was mine, in refusing to make her the wife of an honest man, and promising her to a—a scoundrel! Take her, Philip. She is yours. And—and tell your father that we'll say no more about that load of hay—maybe 'twas all a mistake. I believe you'll make her a good husband—a better, at all events, than Guisebert Van Brunt, the scamp! the villain!"

Then turning to his guests, who had been interested spectators of the scene, the landlord apologized for their having had their rest broken by the vexatious affair.

"Make no apologies," said David; "I, for one, have enjoyed it. It was as good as a play—the true lovers rewarded—the villain discomfited. Just as it should be."

Wishing each other a "Happy New Year," they once more sought their beds.

The de Bonnefoys stayed several days at the Golden Horse, while David transacted with the elder Van Brunt the business about which he had come to Albany. He saw nothing of Guisebert, who was, so his father said, "quite indisposed, and obliged to keep his room."

Nor did the young man ever show his face again at the de Bonnefoy residence when he went down the river as supercargo of the fur-laden sloop.

Not long after this adventure, in which the de Bonnefoys were brought in contact with one of the peculiar customs of their Dutch neighbors, and also learned incidentally that the man who has two strings to his bow may fail of success with both, an event happened that touched them much more closely.

CHAPTER XX

AN UNEXPECTED ARRIVAL

"Leave me alone for that," said ...Dominique, with a sly wink; "except ...for the money-belt, which contained a ...hundred livres, and the coat and the ...shirt those soldiers robbed me of, I have ...all the property I ever had."

"That is good news," said David, "for ...we need some moneyed men to help us in ...our improvements. We have laid the ...foundations of a church, and the very ...women have carried stones in their hands ...and mortar in their aprons, but the work ...lags for lack of funds."

"Well, I may perhaps be able to give ...you some help," said Dominique, cau...tiously. "I think, on the whole, my ...recantation, as you call it, was a bene...fit to me financially, for many people ...thought of me who would not have traded ...with an acknowledged Huguenot. But ...what's the good of money with a con...science ill at ease?"

"Are you still a bachelor, Cousin ...Dominique?"

"That I am, cousin. No wife for me. ...Wives are too expensive. It is a new ...gown, or a new hood, or a necklace, or ...a pair of red-heeled shoes—every day of ...their life."

The big man, in his selfishness, had not thought to mention that there were others on the vessel, but at this juncture a young man bounded up the companion-way three steps at a time, and flung himself into the arms of David, kissing and embracing him with the most extravagant demonstrations of joy.

It was his son Raoul, released from his position in the burgher guard, and come to join his family in New Rochelle.

"O my father! my dear father! How glad I am to see you!"

Then in a torrent of questions which he hardly waited to have answered, he asked about his mother, and Gabrielle, and grandmother, and the girls, and everybody!

"But wait, father, wait. You do not know all!" he suddenly exclaimed, and plunging down the companion-way again, disappeared in the regions below.

"What does he mean?" said David, bewildered.

Before Dominique, in his somewhat ponderous way, could answer, the volatile young man re-appeared on deck, leading by the hand pretty Rosalie Bertrand, who, all smiles and blushes, looked more like a sweet wild rose than ever, and followed by her quiet, sedate mother, Cousin Pauline, who looked not a day older than when David had seen her last.

"Here she is, father! Here's the darling girl who has promised to be my wife! We could not be married over there, you know, for the marriage would not have been legal, but we shall be married here, just as soon as Gabrielle and Christine can get ready the marriage feast!"

David greeted his relatives warmly, but seemed rather surprised at seeing Pauline.

"Is it possible," said he, "that my good second-cousin Pauline has become a member of 'the Religion'?"

"Oh, no. I shall live and die in the religion in which I was brought up. But the children having taken a fancy to each other, and being bent on going to America, I thought it best to accompany them, and I shall not object to my daughter's adopting her husband's faith, if she so chooses."

David then conducted the two ladies to his house, leaving the men to follow, after they had seen to the landing of their effects.

Very soon they joined the family group, and all rejoiced together at the happy reunion. And the good dinner so thoughtfully provided by Gabrielle for some possibly destitute persons, was joyfully set before and heartily enjoyed by her own most welcome relatives.

And oh! how much there was to tell on either side of what had happened in the interval! Cousin Pauline and her daughter were astonished to hear of Gabrielle's adventures on her way to the coast, the lying rascal of a carrier who deserted her having assured them that he had delivered the cask of linen at the Three Windmills as directed.

Raoul, on his part, had much to relate of what had occurred in La Rochelle, which was still under the rod of persecution. "But the most noted event of all," said he, "was the mysterious disappearance of Captain Girard."

At the mention of this name, Gabrielle started and colored.

"He left his quarters one day and went out into the country, and was never seen again in La Rochelle."

"How strange!"

"There was, to be sure, a rumor that an officer of dragoons had been arrested, thrown into prison, and afterwards sent to the galleys, for aiding a Huguenot woman to escape—but of course it could not have been he—"

An exclamation from Gabrielle startled them all. She was now pale as death.

"O Raoul! O father! It must have been he!—for he did aid a woman to escape, and I myself was that woman."

"You?" said her father. "How could that be? He did not know you."

MILWAUKEE'S REVIVAL

THE interdenominational tent campaign that was started in Milwaukee, Wis., six years ago, was continued this year with renewed interest and power. Not since the days of Moody has there been a greater spiritual interest in that city, Some 250 have made public profession of faith. Many have testified to a clear hope in the forgiveness of sin.

Every year the work has grown in influence, until this year the entire city has been enlisted, and every house visited, and all the evangelical bodies have united in the movement. Two prominent evangelists from the Pacific Coast were given full charge of the services. They are the Rev. and Mrs. E. R. Hermiston of Los Angeles, Cal.

Rev. E. R. and Mrs. Hermiston

A meeting was held just before the campaign began, in one of the large downtown churches, and committees were appointed on music, finance, ushers, open-air work and personal work. Each church was given one or two nights when they would be responsible for the open-air work on the wagon, in the choir, and in the personal work. In some of the parks where the Gospel wagon went, as many as 2,000 people heard the Gospel preached. In some instances men who followed the evangelists to the tent were converted, and families were reconciled and even infidels were won. On every Friday evening a special musical programme was given, and on these evenings seldom could the crowds be accommodated. Every afternoon at four o'clock a meeting for boys and girls was held, and every one who came ten times was given the Gospel of Luke. These services were very fruitful and many were converted. Mr. Hermiston is not only a gifted speaker, but also a sweet singer. He frequently stops and sings a verse or two of a Gospel song in the midst of his sermon. Mrs. Hermiston is also a very gifted speaker, and has special power as a preacher to children. There is a pathos in her heart-to-heart talks that has led many to a decision for Christ.

on the qui vive every moment of the time. The tuneful solo: "He Will Hold Me Fast," was the first item on his informal programme. Not one man in all that Bowery crowd had ever heard it before, yet in ten minutes they were all singing it. Within the first five minutes of Mr. Alexander's leadership, every man in the meeting seemed to become his slave. They did, or tried to do, whatever he asked.

"Now let's sing 'What a Friend We Have in Jesus,'" said this unique precentor. "Where did you first hear that hymn, brother?" "My mother sang it to me," was the answer. "Why, that's just what I was going to say," said Mr. Alexander. "Where did you first hear it, brother?" "In Sunday School," was the reply. "Where did you first hear it, Mother Bird?" "In the Bowery Mission," said the saintly woman. So the interrogations went merrily on for a while. "Now for the chord, Mr. Harkness. Let's have it low; these men have been using their voices for other purposes than singing, and they cannot get very high." Crash! came the chord on the piano, and off went the old familiar tune, with a newness and power that were wonderful.

Then came "The Old-Time Religion," with the solo by Mr. Alexander, followed by a few words of stirring testimony by Mr. John Callahan of the Hadley Mission. "Where Is My Wandering Boy To-night?" "Tell Mother I'll Be There," with the solo sung with exquisite sweetness by Mr. Virgo; "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Saviour," and many other songs, came, interspersed with prayers, and by Mr. Alexander's short and telling talks, all culminating in a powerful plea for instant decision.

Then a wonderful scene occurred. One after another, men arose to their feet, and were taken into the spacious kitchen behind, where Mr. Alexander sent Mr. Virgo and the superintendent to deal with them. It was not, strictly speaking, an "after-meeting," for Mr. Alexander still kept on in the main hall, for another half-hour, with his songs and appeals. It was a time of blessed confusion. In the kitchen was a great crowd of men earnestly seeking salvation. One poor drunkard was on his feet, the tears streaming down his face, and he was saying, "I'm too bad to be saved! I've deserted my wife and children for four years. There's no hope for me!" Another man was crying out, "I'm past redemption!" and devoted workers were speaking words of hope and comfort. Mr. Virgo moved about amidst the crowd, speaking stirring words, and leading off in a chorus, even whilst, in the adjoining hall, the great audience were singing in larger volume under Mr. Alexander's direction.

When the meeting ended, it was found that thirty-five men had given themselves up to God.

J. G. Hallimond, Superintendent.

PUTS THE "GINGER" IN

The Kind of Food Used by Athletes.

A former college athlete, one of the long distance runners, began to lose his power of endurance. His experience with a change in food is interesting.

"While I was in training on the track athletic team, my daily 'jogs' became a task until after I was put on Grape-Nuts food for two meals a day. After using the Food for two weeks I felt like a new man. My digestion was perfect, nerves steady and I was full of energy.

"I trained for the mile and the half mile runs (those events which require so much endurance), and then the long daily 'jogs,' which before had been such a task, were clipped off with ease. I won both events.

"The Grape-Nuts food put me in perfect condition and gave me my 'ginger.' Not only was my physical condition made perfect and my weight increased, but my mind was made clear and vigorous, so that I could get out my studies in about half the time formerly required. Now, most all of the University men use Grape-Nuts, for they have learned its value, but I think my testimony will not be amiss and may perhaps help some one to learn how the best results can be obtained."

There's a reason for the effect of Grape-Nuts food on the human body and brain. The certain elements in wheat and barley are selected with special reference to their power for rebuilding the brain and nerve centres. The product is then carefully and scientifically prepared so as to make it easy of digestion. The physical and mental results are so apparent after two or three weeks' use as to produce a profound impression. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

NO maintain the respect of the paint trade for thirty-three years is accomplishing something.

And that is what LOWE BROTHERS and "HIGH STANDARD" PAINT have done. Trade-associates, like members of a family, get one another's measure down pretty accurately. And in a third-of-a-century they know a firm, and a product, down to the ground.

Ask any fair man who is paint-connected or paint-informed concerning

Lowe Brothers
High Standard Liquid Paint

Gives Best Results

And what the Lowe Brothers' word back of a product stands for. "HIGH STANDARD" PAINT is made, in exact accordance with the formula our experience has proven to be right for paint efficiency, by the most perfected paint machinery—much of it of our own design; mixed and ground to a remarkable fineness and thoroughness. "HIGH STANDARD" PAINT is sealed in air-tight cans always fresh and good—always ready to use. Look for the "Little Blue Flag"—your protection.

There is a Lowe Brothers product for every paint- and varnish-purpose, and a Lowe Brothers dealer in nearly every town.

The Lord That Healeth

HOW can I praise my God aright
For all the mercies of the night?
How can I bless him through the day
For love and guidance all the way?

How shall I live that he may know
My heart with love doth overflow?
That prayers are answered yea or nay?
That I am glad in him to-day?

How must I live that he may see Himself pleasured in me?
Lord, teach me how. On bended knee
I yield myself anew to thee.

Give unto this poor heart of mine
Sweet fellowship with love divine;
Let pain and sickness, sin and care,
No longer find an entrance there.

Instead, oh send the double cure;
Let soul and body both be pure;
I plead again thy Verity,
I am the Lord that healeth thee."

The prayer of faith once cured the blind;
Let kindred faith dwell in my mind;
Then I shall know for surety,
"I am the Lord that healeth thee."

ANNIE E. MICHESER.

A Great Missionary Church

THE Moravian Church is an essentially missionary church. It works among the most widely scattered and degraded tribes and nations of the earth. An interesting phase of its work is among the lepers of Jerusalem and of Surinam, who seem to have been neglected or overlooked by the larger denominations. The Moravian Church was founded in 1457, sixty years before the Reformation in Germany; hence it lays claim to being the oldest Protestant church. The Wesleys were greatly indebted spiritually to the Moravian Church and to Count Zinzendorf, its leader in Germany. The Lutheran State Church of Germany, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, the Reformed State Church of Switzerland and Holland, and the Presbyterian Church of Scotland and Ireland, have always recognized the Moravian Church as a closely allied sister church.

The Church's organ in America is a monthly magazine, The Moravian, published at Bethlehem, Pa., by Mr. Frueauff. It is a most interesting and helpful publication, and one that will enlighten the reader who desires to become acquainted with the remarkable work of the Moravians, their self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of Christ, their missionary enterprises and their great leaders, past and present. The price of The Moravian is $1.50 a year.

Answered Prayers

E. W. T., Illinois. "I wish to publicly acknowledge that God answers believing prayer."

M. V., Brooklyn. "I know God answers prayers. He has answered many for me, one this week, and I thank him gratefully."

Reader. "I promised to acknowledge it to the world if my prayer was answered. It was, and I thank God and give him the glory."

C. R. T., New York. "God has blessed me wonderfully. I promised to acknowledge it to the world. I want to give him all the praise."

Mrs. M., Indiana. "I too want to testify to God's answering prayers. He has often heard and answered my prayers, for which I am thankful."

A. M., Wisconsin. "I wish to testify of God's kindness to those who love him. I called to him when in trouble and he heard me and answered."

I. V. C., Ohio. "I feel it my duty to acknowledge the comfort derived from these prayers. I am a young Christian and know that God does answer prayer."

C. F., Indiana. "I was in great trouble. I promised the Lord if he would deliver me out of this trouble I would give him the praise. He has done so. Praise his holy name."

Reader, Pennsylvania. "I believe in answered prayer: I have asked in faith believing, and to my joy have been answered. I ask that your readers pray that my faith may be increased."

Virginia Reader. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers. He has given me two direct answers to prayer in Jesus' name lately. I am learning to trust him for all things."

Subscriber, Louisiana. "The Lord has often delivered me when I cried to him in great distress. When I tell him of my little daily needs, I realize that the very hairs of my head are all numbered."

Mrs. H., Connecticut. "God has sent me many blessings, for which I am thankful. I am praying for a burden to be removed. I ask the readers to aid me in their prayers that my faith may grow stronger in God."

A. J. A., California. "I wish to express my testimony in regard to answers to prayers. I have recently been more than ever convinced that our Father hears and answers prayers in due time. Do not be discouraged, but be faithful, and you will surely be compensated."

Testimonies have also been received from Mrs. S. E. B., Baltimore, Md.; Reader, Missouri; M. A. L., Evansville, Ind.; Subscriber, Illinois; Mrs. W., South Haven, Mich.; "Grateful," Connecticut; M. H. I., Westchester, Pa.; "A Mother," San Francisco, Calif.; "Believer in Prayer," Texas.

Van Camp's
BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
PORK AND BEANS

No Mixed Beans—All the Same

There is lots of difference in beans. Just the same as with potatoes or chestnuts. The little ones don't get ripe or have that rich, appetizing, mouth-watering flavor. Van Camp's beans are ripe, full, round beans, of equal size—the best produced in the great bean belt of Michigan. They're selected from the finest of the crop every year. It's the same with our Tomatoes. Van Camp's grow right here at our doors, in Indiana, and are picked for us when just of the right ripeness to be luscious and juicy. Not too ripe but just rosy ripe enough. We take only perfect tomatoes. These for the sauce, to add zest to the flavor of the beans as they bake.

Then a cut of toothsome sweet pork—with a strip of lean and a strip of fat—goes in every can. And there you are.

Every can of Van Camp's pork and beans is sterilized at a high temperature and baked to the proper turn. Our chef knows. Van Camp's are better cooked than the home-made kind—save the housewife's time—save fuel, as they are ready to serve hot in ten or fifteen minutes. They are always fresh and ready. Ask for Van Camp's of your Grocer.

WHY NOT GET THE BEST and SAVE FROM $5 to $40?

You know that there must be a big difference between the factory price and the dealer's price on a good stove or range.

Why not save that difference and keep that extra profit in your pocket?

You know that there must be a big difference between a strictly high-grade stove, made of the best materials by expert workmen, and a "cheap" stove made of scrap iron by inferior workmen.

Why not get the best you can find—especially when you can buy it at the actual factory price!

That's exactly what we offer you:

"A Kalamazoo Direct to You"
TRADE-MARK REGISTERED

A Stove or Range of the highest quality at actual Factory Price on 360 Days Approval.

You cannot secure anywhere a better stove or range than the Kalamazoo—no matter how much extra you pay. We guarantee that, under a $20,000 bank bond and give you 360 days in which to prove it yourself.

Our first idea is to make the best stoves and ranges that human skill and experience and honest workmanship can produce from the best procurable materials.

That's why we use only the highest grade pig iron, and a better grade of steel than any other stove manufacturer in the United States.

That's why we employ the most skilled workmen in the business, and maintain one of the best equipped, most modern stove factories in the world.

And that's why the Kalamazoo line has become so famous as fuel-savers, as good bakers and quick heaters; and why they last so long and give such good satisfaction.

At the same time our system of manufacturing and selling direct is such that we save you $5, $10, $20 and in some cases as much as $40 on every purchase.

You cannot get a better at any price. The Kalamazoo is as good a stove or range as man can make—and you save from 20 to 40% in buying it.

And don't forget: you get your money back if it is not in every way exactly as represented.

We pay the freight and ship all Kalamazoos blacked, polished and ready for immediate use. Any man can remove crating and set them up.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Among Dead Centuries*

WHEN the nineteenth century died, its spirit descended to the vaulted chamber of the past, where the spirits of the dead centuries sit on granite thrones together. When the newcomer entered, all turned toward him and the spirit of the eighteenth century spoke: "Tell thy tale, brother. Give us word of the human kind we left to thee."

"I am the spirit of the wonderful century. I gave man the mastery over nature. Discoveries and inventions, which lighted the black space of the past like lonely stars, have clustered in a milky way of radiance under my rule. One man does by the touch of his hand what the toil of a thousand slaves never did. Knowledge has unlocked the mines of wealth, and the hoarded wealth of to-day creates the vaster wealth of to-morrow. Man has escaped the slavery of necessity and is free.

"I freed the thoughts of men. They face the facts and know. Their knowledge is common to all. The deeds of the East at eve are known in the West at morn. They send their whispers under the seas and across the clouds.

"I broke the chains of bigotry and despotism. I made men free and equal. Every man feels the worth of his manhood.

"I have touched the summit of history. I did for mankind what none of you did before. They are rich. They are wise. They are free."

The spirits of the dead centuries sat silent, with troubled eyes. At last the spirit of the first century spoke for all.

"We all spoke proudly when we came here in the flush of our deeds, and thou more proudly than we all. But as we sit and think of what was before us, and what has come after us, shame and guilt bear down our pride. Your words sound as if the redemption of man had come at last. Has it come?

"You have made men rich. Tell us, is none in pain with hunger to-day and none in fear of hunger for to-morrow? Do all children grow up fair of limb and trained for thought and action? Do none die before their time? Has the mastery of nature made men free to enjoy their lives and loves, and to live the higher life of the mind?

"You have made men wise. Are they wise or cunning? Have they learned to restrain their bodily passions? Have they learned to deal with their fellows in justice and love?

"You have set them free. Are there none, then, who toil for others against their will? Are all men free to do the work they love best?

"You have made men one. Are there no barriers of class to keep man and maid apart? Does none rejoice in the cause that makes the many moan? Do men no longer spill the blood of men for their ambition and the sweat of men for their greed?"

As the spirit of the nineteenth century listened, his head sank to his breast.

"Your shame is already upon me. My great cities are as yours were. My millions live from hand to mouth. Those who toil longest have least. My thousands sink exhausted before their days are half spent. My human wreckage multiplies. Class faces class in sullen distrust. Their freedom and knowledge has only made men keener to suffer. Give me a seat among you, and let me think why it has been so."

The others turned to the spirit of the first century. "Your promised redemption is long in coming."

"But it will come," he replied.

*From Christianity and the Social Crisis, by Walter Rauschenbusch. A thoughtful book on present economic conditions, appealing to the clergy to strive for the social betterment of the poor. It should be read by every minister who desires to do even a little to save our country from threatening social peril. Pp. 429. Price $1.75. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York.

Crucifixion and Holiness*

THE reconciliation of Christ is intended to form a motive for the highest holiness. Any view of that work which is so stated as to have any other effect must be a perverted view. Such a perversion Paul had in mind when, in the course of his argument in the Epistle to the Romans, he enquires, "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?"(Rom. 6:1) an inference he promptly repudiates.

Salvation in the full meaning of the term in the Scriptures is not conceived as a completed process when the soul at the central crisis of its religious history believes on this finished work of Christ. Rather that is the point at which its new life begins. Christ's finished reconciliation is the basis of all; but it is by no means all that the grace of God contemplates for us. Because Christ gave himself to be a sin-offering for us, it is not to be inferred that this discharges the believer from the fulfilment of the law of holiness; "That the ordinance of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit" (Rom. 8:4). The work of Christ rather commits the believer, pre-empts him—so to speak, mortgages him—to holiness, as nothing else possibly could; nay, more, it even prescribes the norm according to which the new life is to be devoted to God; that norm is found in the lengths to which Christ's holy will went in dealing with the sin-problem, even unto death.

As God in Christ spared not himself, so we who believe are to spare not ourselves in conformity to our Redeemer's will. The unsparing devotion of Christ to us is to be reciprocated in the power of the divine spirit. We are to stop not short of complete crucifixion to everything that stands between us and obedience to his will. The Pauline confession is the ideal expression of it: "I have been crucified with Christ, and it is no longer I that live; but Christ liveth in me, and that life which I now live in the flesh, I live in the faith which is in the Son of God who loved me and gave himself up for me" (Gal. 2:20). Said the eloquent French preacher, Lacordaire: "The church was born crucified."

option law; but it is found to be heavily handicapped, because a three fifths majority is required. A majority of one may elect the highest officer, but to vote out the worst curse, there must be three fifths.

In Queensland the standard is three-fifths, only taxpayers voting. In Victoria there is the additional handicap of "compensation" to the liquor dealer, who must be paid an inflated valuation of his business if closed out. In South Australia local option can accomplish only a reduction of one-third in three years; but only a majority is required, and all electors, including women, can vote. If "no license" as well as "reduction" were on the ballot, and votes for no license, if unsuccessful, were added to the reduction vote, the South Australia plan, it is claimed by temperance leaders there, would be the best of all. In New South Wales, the law requires a "no license" vote to be taken at the same time that men are elected to the legislature, and for the same districts. Although this law also is handicapped by the requirement of a three-fifths majority, we are just going into a campaign through the whole State, that will be concluded early in September. All over Australia there is protest against the infamy of the bar-maid system.

Sunday in this Anglo-Saxon continent is not yet protected from what is the chief shame of the English Sunday: liquor selling. In Australian States it is usually illegal to sell liquors on Sunday, except to boarders and bona fide travelers, but those unwise and needless exceptions open the way to many abuses. In Melbourne, hundreds of persons are counted Sunday after Sunday going from the street into these bars, and in Adelaide, where the law required bars to be closed and lights put out on Sunday, a preacher recently counted more than one hundred lighted bars on one Sunday night, and reported this to the authorities, with the result that the law has since been better enforced.

Foremost, as usual elsewhere, among the forces contending by a comprehensive campaign against the big four evils, is the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, planted here by its first round-the-world missionary, Mrs. Leavitt, and strengthened by subsequent missionaries, Miss Jessie Ackerman and Mrs. Barney. This organization and the Y. M. C. A. look to America for leadership in new paths. There are Councils of Churches, Temperance Alliances, Rechabites, Good Templars, Sons and Daughters of Temperance. In Adelaide an Anti-Gambling League has just been organized, with Bishop A. N. Thomas at its head, which reminds us how fitting it is for bishops to lead in such aggressive movements of social ethics.

The Roman Catholic Church is strangely backward in Australia, and is more like the Romanists of Italy, Spain and Mexico than like the British and American Catholics. The only lotteries left in Australia are those of the Roman Catholics, who are also counted as on the wrong side in battles with intemperance and Sabbath-breaking.

Labor representatives, who have a measure of control as a "balance of power party" in all the parliaments of Australia, have thus far been so absorbed in economic reforms, including a pending effort to break up great holdings of land by a progressive land tax, that they have not yet given much attention to the vast economic wastes of vice; but several of their leaders are also moral leaders. For example, Mr. Bowman, the labor leader in Queensland, is regarded by temperance people as their best friend in Parliament, and the Premier of South Australia, labor's only premier at present, holds a similar place there.

$60 In One Week!

DOES YOUR CHURCH NEED MONEY?

The Ladies' Aid Society of the First Presbyterian Church of Collinsville, Ill., raised $60.00 for their church in one week by taking subscriptions for The National Home Journal at 50 cents a year.

A bible class in the First M. E. Church of Decatur, Ill., raised $30 in a few days.

The President of the Epworth League of the Methodist Church at Tuxedo Park, Mo., was desirous of having his league raise $50 for a special purpose. He states that they raised $12 of this amount within an hour after he explained our plan to the members and he feels sure they will get the balance in a short time.

More than 100 other churches have raised money by this plan—some have raised as much as $160.00.

We have a very special plan which will enable any church to raise from $25 to $150 in a short time, and with little work.

If you care to know how your church can raise from $25 to $150 in exchange for a little work in the interest of The National Home Journal, fill in coupon below and mail to

THE NATIONAL HOME JOURNAL, St. Louis, Mo.

Every church society which takes up this work can offer FREE a beautiful little book, "The Rubaiyat of the Roses," with each yearly subscription. Leading writers and critics have pronounced this the greatest and most beautiful poem of the century. It contains 101 beautiful stanzas—each stanza a gem of poetic thought. Note what Levi Gilbert, Editor Western Christian Advocate, and others say in regard to this remarkable book:

"Mr. Dunroy has produced a worthy and helpful work that will brace the faith of many. It conveys fine and high truths."—REV. LEVI GILBERT, D.D., Editor Western Christian Advocate.

"It is full of the sacred perfume of flowers and poetry, both. This production ought to put Will Reed Dunroy in the front rank of our American poets."—CHARLES FREDERICK GOSS, D.D.

"This work in my judgment, should give you an honored place among American poets. There is life, there is beauty and there is hope in every stanza. The world needs such a tonic as this and I hope it will recognize your splendid achievement."—H. W. SEYMOUR, Editor New York World.

"'The Rubaiyat of the Roses' is as inspiring as it is clever. It is poetry and it is a tonic for the spirits. The reader feels more in love with life and with the world after its perusal."—ALVIN DILL WILSON, D.D.

"The sentiment of Mr. Dunroy's stanzas is sane and stimulating, while their distinctive poetic merit must commend them to every lover of literary art and taste."—T. W. HUNT, Professor of English, Princeton University.

The National Home Journal is a beautiful magazine of exceptional merit. It is printed on fine paper and in two colors—the only strictly high class magazine ever published at 50 cents a year. Reason and Faith*

NOT as a check to prayer, not as a reproof to the man who cries to God, were the words written that, in the first passage associated with the topic, are ascribed to God: "Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." The cry was very natural. The great host, comprising women and children, were on the margin of the sea. Going forward required stronger faith than that of ordinary mortals. It was not astonishing that they should ask for direct assurance of safety. How were they to know that the way would be opened before them? So many things had to be believed. They must believe that Moses was authorized of God to bid them march; that God was able to make a way for them; and that he would exercise his power in their behalf. The dilemma was crucial. Common sense and experience bade them hold back and only faith bade them go forward. We are often told that our judgment must be our guide in the crises of life; yet if these people had relied on their judgment they would not have advanced one foot seaward.

God does not require us to distrust reason, as some would infer from this curt direction to Moses. He does not wish or expect us to be fanatics. He would have us reason on higher grounds than we usually take. These people might have argued that they had committed themselves to God's care in leaving Egypt and entering the desert. Having taken that great step, it would be folly to hesitate about the later steps. Or that, God having ordered their path and indicated it by the pillar of cloud, he was responsible, and, as they had found in Egypt, he was able to carry out his plans. Reason and judgment were not altogether opposed to an advance when such grounds were taken into account. If faith worked with reason, obedience was the direct result.

The lesson for ourselves is clear. It is our first duty to ascertain God's will in any course before us—not by nonsensical appeals to luck, such as by opening the Bible and accepting as a guide the first verse that catches the eye, but by sober reasoning, by prayer for guidance, and by a complete surrender of our own inclinations. This done, and the course decided according to our light, which we have asked God to aid, it is not for us to consider the difficulties in the way nor to allow obstacles to discourage us or to cause us to fear. He that bids us go forward may be trusted to make a way for us, in spite of opposition that seems insurmountable.

Christian Stewardship†

ONLY by persistently keeping the subject before the lay mind can the funds of the Christian Church be kept adequate to the need. It is difficult to convert the pocketbook. None know better than the members of the Epworth League how essential it is periodically, if not continually, to press the subject of finance on the attention of the people. So far has this gone, that it is now reckoned as no small part of a minister's equipment that he should be an effective money-raiser. Yet this is not legitimately a part of a minister's duty. He has a far more important business in the preaching of the Gospel, which is, as Paul said, more than sufficient for any ordinary man. Yet he too had to plead for money. That it was an irksome duty, and one with which he wished to have as little as possible to do, is evident from his expressed wish that "there may be no gatherings when I come." He doubtless preferred to follow the course of the other apostles and confide the duty to a board of deacons (Acts 6:1-4) that they might give themselves "continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word."

After all has been said of the "ministerial beggar," the reproach really rests with the layman, not with the minister. If the layman had the right sense of his stewardship, no appeal for contributions would be needed. "Thou owest thine own self," is a consideration that cannot be justly ignored. If the layman realized the value of his soul, realized the peril in which it had been, and the price that was paid for its redemption, we cannot imagine him haggling about mere money.

As Moses told his people, it is God who gives the power to gain wealth, and on that principle alone he is entitled to a share of the acquisition. We depend on him for health and strength, yet how many dare to defraud him by retaining for their own use all, or nearly all, the proceeds of their labor. Doubtless many do not realize the enormity of this offense, and the tendency of our modern life is to make us oblivious of his claims. But we cannot overlook the claims of our fellow men. The poor we have always with us, and he has permitted us to regard them as his representatives. He does not need our gifts. The whole world with all its riches is his, but he would have us give for our own sakes. None are so poor as they who hoard their money and fear to part with it. He would have us enlarge our souls by giving, and has compassed the duty about with all kinds of encouragement. He promises that in making others happy we shall be made happy ourselves; that our means of giving shall be increased, and that in the end we shall learn that in giving to the poor we have been giving to him, who is able to reward us abundantly.

Called Higher

In his ninety-second year, Thomas G. Bell, of Steubenville, Ohio, received his summons on January 4, 1907, to enter into the kingdom prepared for those who love and serve their Lord.

On April 27, Rev. Charles Carroll, of Oakland, Cal., entered into rest. His life work is ended, but because he lived, many "arise and call him blessed." His last words breathed of victory and his home-going was one of perfect peace.

Peter Napoleon Gomon, aged sixty-three years, passed to his rest Sunday, August 25, at Fulton, N. Y. He was a consistent Christian and a reader of this journal for many years. During his long illness he found many words of comfort in its pages.

Triumphant by faith in her Redeemer, Mrs. A. E., wife of William R. Parks, died on June 15, in Saranac, Mich., aged eighty-two years. For many years she had been connected with the Presbyterian Church, devoting her life consistently to the cause of Christ.

Margaret Styles, after a year of great suffering, passed away on May 10, from the home in Gregory, Mich., in which she had been a valued handmaiden for over twenty-seven years. That she had filled acceptably and as a consistent Christian should "that station in life to which it had pleased God to call her," is the testimony of those with whom she dwelt.

KNOWS HOW

Doctor Had Been Over the Road.

When a doctor, who has been the victim of the coffee habit, is benefited by leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee, he knows something about what he is advising in that line.

A good old doctor in Ohio, who had at one time been the victim of the coffee habit, advised a woman to leave off coffee and take on Postum.

She suffered from indigestion and a weak and irregular heart and general nervous condition. She thought that it would be difficult to stop coffee abruptly. She says: "I had considerable hesitancy about making the change, one reason being that a friend of mine tried Postum and did not like it. The doctor, however, gave explicit directions that Postum must be boiled long enough to bring out the flavor and food value.

"His suggestions were carried out and the delicious beverage fascinated me, so that I hastened to inform my friend who had rejected Postum. She is now using it regularly, after she found that it could be made to taste good.

"I observed, a short time after starting Postum, a decided change in my nervous system. I could sleep soundly and my brain was more active. My complexion became clear and rosy, whereas it had been muddy and spotted before; in fact all of the abnormal symptoms disappeared and I am now feeling perfectly well.

"Another friend was troubled in much the same manner as I, and she has recovered from her heart and stomach trouble by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee.

"I know of several others who have had much the same experience. It is only necessary that Postum be well boiled and it wins its own way." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Israel's Second Leader

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE name Joshua is the same as Jesus—i. e., Saviour or Deliverer—and the book of Joshua is full of God's deliverances. The book of the law—i. e., the five books of Moses—tells man what he ought to do, but the book of Joshua tells of power for victory; it is not now, "You ought," but "You can."

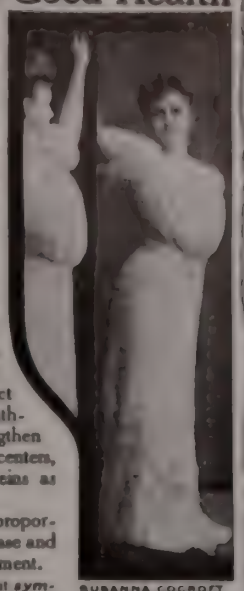
One thing was indispensable to the career of Joshua—it was the death of Moses, the representative of the law. Until we are free from the "I must," "I ought," of the law, we do not know the glorious "I can" of the grace of God: "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4:13). The Lord said to Joshua, Moses' minister, "Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them." Joshua had faithfully followed Moses for many years. When Moses went up into Mount Sinai, Joshua accompanied him when all the elders of Israel tarried behind (Exodus 24: 13,14,) and he was with Moses on his return from the mountain (Exodus 32:17). He was also in the tabernacle when God descended upon it, "and spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Exodus 33:11). Joshua again was one of the two faithful spies who brought up unto the children of Israel a good report of the land which they had searched, and only he and Caleb were exempt from the judgment pronounced upon that generation—that they should die in the wilderness and not see the good land which God had promised them. (Numbers 14:6-10, 22-24, 36-38).

"Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise." Joshua, no doubt, felt very helpless without the presence of him whom he had served so many years. And just as helpless does any child of God feel when the impetus of "I ought" and "I must" is taken away, unless, indeed, he has accepted Jesus as his victorious power and strength, and has learned to glory in his infirmities "that the power of Christ may rest upon him." Oh, how many believers there are amongst us who not only accept pardon in Christ, but also present their bodies a living sacrifice to him (Rom. 12: 1), and yet fail to arise and take possession of the ground which Jesus has overcome, and who therefore remain burdened, anxious, dissatisfied, powerless, and inconsistent!

God calls for progress in our experience and leads us on to possession: "Go over this Jordan," let no barrier stand between you and the promises of God. "Go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. Every place that the soul of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses." Every gift of God brings responsibility upon us to accept or to reject it. All is grace; but God's grace is accepted grace or rejected grace with every one of us.

A land lay before the children of Israel, but no inch of ground was theirs until they came in contact with it, and rested their weight upon it. Exactly thus is it with the promises of God. We do not possess them simply by an assent to the fact that God has given them to us; we have to set the sole of our foot upon them, to put them to the proof whether they will bear our weight or no, in order to know with absolute certainty that he has given them to us. No man is saved by simply accepting the fact intellectually that Jesus died for his sins; but let a man who is awakened by the Spirit of God to know he is on the way to an eternity unprovided for, and a judgment which he cannot escape, rest the weight of his guilty soul on the blessed fact that "the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all," and he finds salvation.

Any Woman Can Have Good Health a Charming Personality And a Good Figure



SUSANNA COCROFT

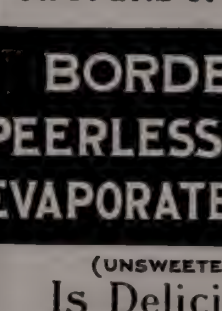
MANY a woman has surprised her husband and friends by giving 15 minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to special directions which I give to her for the care of health, face and figure. Over 20,000 women have studied themselves under my direction in the past five years.

Are You Tired of Drugs?

I use no drugs. I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercise for nerves and muscles controlling such organs, bring a good circulation of warm blood which I purify by teaching correct breathing and by prescribing the special diet, bathing, etc., adapted to each individual. I strengthen all your vital organs, lungs, heart, nerve centers, and send your blood bounding through your veins as when a child.

I develop or reduce your figure to correct proportions. I teach you to stand and to walk with an ease and dignity which at once bespeak culture and refinement.

Clear Skin and a Good Figure Every figure can be rounded out symmetrically unless bones are missing or tissues entirely wasted away, and the woman who carries from 20 to 100 pounds of superfluous flesh every time she moves has my sympathy but she does not need to do so—and surely it is every woman's privilege and duty to keep herself attractive and pleasing.



Miss Cocroft at Her Desk.

How to Stand and Walk When you request details about my lessons, I send you, Free, a booklet showing you how to stand and walk correctly, with a card of correct poise for your dressing table.

What My Pupils Say of My Work

I wish every nervous teacher could know what benefit is to be derived from your physical culture.
I have lost 13 pounds, and was never better. I look ten years younger.
My billousness is entirely relieved.
Just think how I have gained, since I began with you, from 112 to 137½ lbs. in one year.
My catarrh and lungs are much better and my body, which was a bony, crooked structure, is actually beginning to look like your picture of correct pose.
My head is steady, the confused feeling having gone. It is the best money ever spent for myself.
Just think, Miss Cocroft, before I took up your work I could not eat anything without the greatest distress, and now I think I could digest tacks. I am so happy.

Personal Instructions Write me fully, also letting me know your faults of figure, etc. I will make a personal study of your case and will let you know whether I can help you or not. Your letter will be held in strict confidence. I never publish letters without special permission, though I can send you hundreds of testimonials from women I have helped, who have given me permission to show their letters.

Talmage Sermon Treasury

Twenty Large-Print Volumes, Aggregating 8,500 Pages, Bound in Cloth and Gold, Containing over 500 of Dr. Talmage's Choicest Discourses--No Preacher's Library Complete Without this Great Work

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D., stood before the Christian world for upwards of forty years, as one of the most eloquent exponents of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Never before, since the days of Peter and Paul, had it been given to any one man to preach through pulpit or press to such vast audiences as he has been privileged to address.

Dr. Talmage's sermons are marvels of vivid imagery and superb word painting, rich beyond comparison in anecdote and incident, unsurpassed for originality, versatility, terseness and splendor of diction, and notable for their close fidelity to the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour as laid down in the New Testament. They constitute a vast mine of information, covering nearly every phase of national and religious life and thought, and are generally admitted to be the best known models of popular presentation of religious truth.

These discourses are justly noted for their wealth of pertinent illustrations, and the possessor of this Comprehensive Sermonic Library, will find readily available thousands of the choicest anecdotes peculiarly adapted to the enrichment of talks, sermons, Sunday School expositions, and public addresses of whatsoever character. It matters not whether the occasion be a Christmas Celebration, a Thanksgiving Service, a Patriotic Festival, a Missionary Address, a Funeral Oration, or a Prayer Meeting Talk, these discourses will be found full of suggestive ideas, full of illustration, and full of helpful hints that will prove invaluable in the preparation, embellishment and presentation of the subject.

T. DEWITT TALMAGE

Every volume of this great Sermonic Library is separately indexed and cross-indexed as to texts, titles, anecdotal and historical illustrations and topics, so thoroughly that the contents are readily available whether for suggestion, illustration, reinforcement or for special courses of reading. Then the entire twenty volumes, aggregating over 8,500 pages, are indexed as one work, in the same complete and thorough-going manner, so that this general index will aid any one to find with the greatest facility all the utterances of this eloquent pulpit orator on any particular subject.

Please bear in mind that the index to this notable series of Dr. Talmage's sermons, representing the very cream of the life-work of this eloquent and world-renowned preacher, contains over 25,000 distinct references.

After many months of the most careful revision and preparation, Dr. Talmage, six years ago, consented to the publication, in book form, of more than 500 of his most forceful discourses, specially selected for this purpose, and we now offer these twenty volumes at the low price of $20 for the set. One Dollar Down, and One Dollar a month for nineteen months, or 10% off for spot cash.

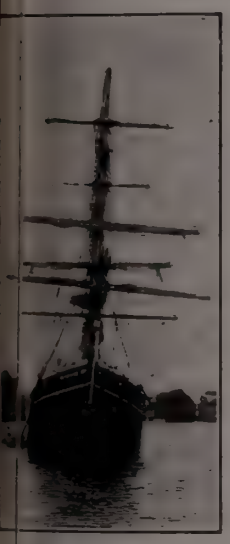
Steering Wheel of the "America"

Camp Wellman, with the Balloon Shed in the Foreground

On Top of the Giant Balloon

Photographs by Underwood & Underwood

BY BALLOON TO THE NORTH POLE



The "Frithjof"

SEVERAL explorers are striving for the honor of first reaching the North Pole, and, despite the many disasters that have occurred, the passion for "farthest north" seems unabated. Practically all attempts up to this year have been made by sailing as far north during the summer months as the ice fields would permit, then going into winter quarters, and, with the first sign of the returning spring, making a dash on dog sledges toward the pole.

It has remained for Walter Wellman, the noted American journalist and explorer, to attempt, in a practical manner, the discovery of the pole by sailing northward in science's latest vehicle, the airship. The nearest approach to this was the attempt made by the Swedish scientist, Andree, to reach the pole by a balloon. Andree went up in his balloon on July 11, 1897, with two assistants, Frankel and Strinberg. Spitzbergen was the point of their departure. The balloon was a large one, and furnished with drag ropes, but had no artificial means of propulsion and no steering gear. The explorers trusted to the currents of air to send them in a northerly direction. A few brief messages came from them by carrier pigeons, and a few floating buoys were picked back; but as all had been liberated within a few hours of the balloon's ascent, the information they brought amounted to little. From that time to this, nothing has ever been learned of the fate of Andree and his companions. Probably somewhere in the unknown north the balloon was wrecked and plunged into the icy waters of the arctic sea.

Mr. Wellman and his associates have devised a flying machine that is far from being the fragile craft we usually picture when aerial navigation is mentioned. The America, for such is the name of the ship, is of unusual size, and, with the exception of its gas reservoir, made of the finest steel. The America is one hundred and eighty feet long and over fifty-two feet wide. The car, made entirely of steel, is one hundred and fifteen feet in length. From the bottom of the car to the top of the sausage-shaped balloon it is sixty-five feet. The coating of the balloon if laid flat would cover half an acre. The ship's cargo, supplies and crew weigh ten tons.

Underneath the car are the storage tanks in which is kept the gasoline that furnishes the power to the motors. The tanks are so arranged that the fluid can be pumped from any one of them, and thus assist in balancing the ship when necessary.

Mr. Wellman, a few weeks ago, made his second attempt to sail for the North Pole, and, though driven back, enough was learned of the powers of the America, to make the explorer believe that in his third trial he will be successful.

The America was attached to the steamer Express just before the second trial. When the lines were cast off, the airship rose magnificently, with perfect equilibrium. The wind, however, commenced to blow a gale in the upper currents, and soon the America was fighting hard to make headway. The storm forced it slowly in toward the coast, and some jagged peaks that would have meant the destruction of the airship if she had been blown against them. The America, however, gradually gained headway and reached the northern end of the range. Wellman then gave orders to steer for the pole, but then a new obstacle to success appeared: the wind not only increased in strength, but snow began to fall.

In trying to get back to the vicinity of the Express, they found themselves once more driven in towards the mountains that before had threatened them with destruction. Putting on full power, the airship again shot straight against the wind. Once they saw the ship they were seeking far below, but the next minute she was lost to view in the drifting snow clouds.

Three times the America circled about and then tried to land. It sailed slowly over a glacier; a brake rope and a trailer that was loaded with supplies were let down, and these slackened the airship's speed. When it was over a second and higher glacier, the valve was opened and the airship began slowly to descend. It settled for three hundred feet and struck with but little damage. A few hours later the explorers were found by the crew of the Express. It took three days to get the airship off the upper glacier and back to the camp at Virgo Bay. The explorers lived in the car of the America during the three days, and were perfectly comfortable, though the air outside was very cold, and snow was falling. The great balloon shed and the camp have been fitted up for the coming winter. Next spring Mr. Wellman will make his third attempt, as he believes there can be no doubt of his success if he starts in "normal summer weather."

Glorious Revelations

TEXT: II. Cor. 12:3

"I knew such a man (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth)."

A FRIEND of mine was some time ago reading that fascinating book of Frances Hodgson Burnett, entitled, The One I Knew Best of All, and for a long time he did not know that the heroine of the book and the author were one. He followed the little girl step by step, as she grew up, until this fact suddenly dawned upon him. "Why," he said, "Mrs. Burnett is writing the history of her own life." The same fact is true about the autobiographies of Charles Dickens and Thomas Hughes and Lord Byron and Thomas DeQuincey. When you read David Copperfield, you are reading, with an added touch of romance, the autobiography of Charles Dickens. When you read Tom Brown's School Days, you are reading Thomas Hughes' early life at Rugby. When you read Childe Harold, you are reading a malformed and distorted history of the life of Lord Byron. When you read the Confession of an Opium Eater, you are reading of the Chamber of Horrors in which DeQuincey lived for many years. These authors may not have said, in plain words, that the characters of their autobiographies were reincarnations of themselves; but they were, just as the prominent men and women of social and political England of the Victorian era moved through the pages of Disraeli's novels masquerading under fictitious names.

Paul was writing the chapter of my text in the third person. There had been many criticisms made against the great apostle, because, though he had never seen Jesus, he assumed authority as a teacher of Christianity. If you examine Paul's writings carefully you will find that he uses the personal pronoun "I" far more than any other inspired writer in either the New Testament or the Old. His enemies claimed that he was a blatant, conceited boaster. So, in order to disarm any unjust criticisms, he describes one of the most important experiences of his life, referring to it in the third person. He said, "I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth); such an one caught up to the third heaven." Then Paul goes on and tells how this man, this third person who was himself, had the most marvelous manifestation of God's power and love. All the time the Corinthians are reading this account, methinks we can hear them say, "Do you suppose Paul is alluding to himself? Do you suppose Paul himself has been in Paradise?" Indeed, I have often thought that by putting this divine manifestation in the third person, Paul made it even more powerful than if he had directly spoken of it as having occurred to himself.

A Mysterious Experience

Now, it has always been a debatable question among Bible students what this glorious revelation which came to Paul really was. It was evidently one of the important moments, if not the supreme moment, of Paul's life. Why, so overwhelming was it that Paul could not tell whether he was in the flesh or out of the flesh when his spiritual exaltation occurred. He could not tell whether his spirit was confined in its tenement of clay, or whether his soul for a little while left his body and took its flight into the unknown world, as our souls will depart when the breath stops, and the pulse ceases to beat, and the physician pronounces us dead. Though many commentators may try to tell us what this Pauline revelation was, I am not going to try to explain it. I do not think Paul wanted us to know what it was.

Paul does not say what he saw or heard in this wonderful vision. As a man admitted to an audience with a king or emperor is expected to maintain a decorous silence about the interview, so Paul says it was not lawful to utter the words he heard in the third heaven. We can understand that. There are some of our own experiences about which we shrink from speaking. They are too solemn, too sacred for utterance; but what an effect they have had on our lives! It would be useless for an infidel to tell some of us that there is no God; we know there is. There have been times when he has come so close to us that we have been conscious of his presence; we have felt him near to us. It is about these times, more common than we sometimes think, that I would speak to you this morning.

Your first great moment of spiritual ecstasy may have come to you as a reaction from an almost miraculous escape from death in early youth. I do not know what that escape was. Perhaps you were skating upon the ice on the river, and suddenly you came too near an air-hole and in you went. You can feel the horror of that cold plunge now. You felt the swift current gripping you as though it was a fiend with a million hands, and all those hands were trying to drag you under the ice. You remember well holding out your arms to save yourself, and the ice breaking as you tried to lift yourself upon its smooth surface. Or perhaps the miraculous escape from death came when you, as a little boy, were down by the old saw-mill, fishing. Your mother had forbidden you to go into a boat. For some time you had been fishing on the shore. But the waters out in the middle of the pond did look so inviting. The huge logs did look so big. Then, with your bare feet, you began to run across them. Then, when you found just the right place to cast your line, you dropped it. But after the first nibble of a fish, those big logs under your feet began to roll. Then the other logs began to force them in. Then those huge logs were closing over your head, when your little companion lay down flat upon his stomach and extended to you his fishing-pole and pulled you out.

Narrow Escapes

Or it may have been that your narrow escape from death came in some awful runaway. You can see now the horses plunging and taking the bits in their teeth. You can hear the crash, as the wagon is shattered against a tree. Or perhaps, like George Washington's mother, during a thunder storm you had a friend struck dead before your eyes by the lightning. I do not know what that early escape was. But this I do know: there is hardly a man, woman or child who has not in youth come so near death as to almost feel the cold air of the tomb fanning the cheek. Why, you were so near death that just one step more, and you would have been over the precipice, or under the revolving wheel of the car. Now, what was the reaction of that sudden escape from death in the early days of your youth?

At first you began to tremble like an aspen leaf. You did not do this while you were still looking into the yawning abyss of the grave. The grave opened and shut so quickly that you did not realize what was happening until all danger was past. Then the cold sweat began to break out over you; your nerves began to twitch; you began to say, "O God, I never knew till now how near one could come to death and yet escape it. For what hast thou saved me?" And all through the succeeding days and nights the Lord Jesus Christ seemed to be standing by your side, saying, "I have saved you that you might become my disciple. God gave you a divine revelation at that time, just as Christ appeared unto Paul in the scene of my text, when he was taken up into the third heaven and knew not whether he was in the body or out of the body.

The next glorious revelation which came to you may have been a few years later, when, under the power of a great Gospel revival, you surrendered your life to the Master, joined the church and sat at the Table of the Holy Communion. How that scene comes back now! There is the little white church, with its straight-backed pews. There is the choir loft, in which your sister used to sing. There is the old prayer-meeting room below, which was used for the Sunday School before the Sunday morning preaching. There were the gravestones you used to play among on week days, and try to read the epitaphs on Sunday, when the minister would persist in praying about everything from the creation down to the President of the United States and all others in authority.

A Church Revival

If some one should ask you how that revival started, you could not answer. Suddenly, without any apparent cause, the power of the Holy Spirit began to descend. It was clearly felt through all the country. One Sunday, the old minister, instead of giving out his text as usual, opened the service in words something like these—"Brethren, I have tried to write a sermon this week, but it has been an impossibility. Every time I entered my study, the still small voice of God kept saying, 'Down on your knees and pray. Pray for my people. Pray, pray, pray!' And, my dear people, I dare not disobey the voice of God. As I have been praying so much for you this week, I thought I would turn this morning's service into a simple prayer meeting. Then we will meet in the church during the coming week each night, and we shall pray for each other and for our dear ones." You remember how your mouth opened wide with astonishment. As the different people arose, one after the other, to pray, you got tired and commenced to wriggle in your seat. But, somehow, a strange feeling of unrest came over you, when your dear mother arose to pray. You never heard her pray in public before in your life. But when she commenced with a trembling voice, and "O Lord, dear Master, precious Saviour, come our midst and take these little lambs into thy ar you could not keep back the tears. You knew she praying for you.

Children Overcome

Then that ride home! The old family farm w never had a quieter burden to carry than on that Even your youngest brother did not try to grab reins, as he so often had done. Your father quiet; your mother was very quiet. She always speak those words, "My dear," sweetly; but she spoke them so tenderly as on that day. Then at dinner, when your father tried to ask the bles he broke down. You never saw him cry like that once since, and that was when you led him away, years later, from your sister's open grave. And that afternoon—it was the longest afternoon you spent. Elizabeth went to her room. And your m went to her room. Though they were each alone, you went near to their doors, you could hear them ing. They were not alone. They were talking to about you. Then you went out to the barn and you found your father. He was on his knees pra What were they all praying about? And then you to your room. As you closed the door, you dropped down by the bed and began to sob and You kept saying, "O God! O God! O God!" could not get any further. But suddenly you fe arm about your neck. No one but she could touched you like that. But as she said, "O I hear my boy's prayer," a wonderful scene took Like Peter, you seemed to be upon the houseto Joppa. But unlike Peter's vision, the vision you was only Christ's glory. It shone about your head crept into your heart. It rang from your Whether you were in the body or out of the body could not tell. But one fact you do know, Christ revealed himself to you by your mother's side. came and touched you. Are you to-day living to the divine call of that glorious revelation?

Many years ago, a young Scotch girl gave her to God at one of George Whitefield's meetings. one asked her, "My dear, is your heart changed?" she answered, "Something I know is changed. It be the world. It may be my heart. There is a change somewhere, I am sure. For everything is different from what it once was." Thus was it with on that Sunday afternoon. You arose from your and gave your heart to God. Oh, Christ was so di ent. The love of your father and mother and was so different. Your own purposes of life we different. You were like Cowper, filled with ecstasy because you were surrounded by a divine lation. Yet, alas, alas! how soon we have desce from the heights of our Mounts of Transfiguratio

ENTHUSIASTIC JAPANESE GIRLS

By MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

MOST interesting experiment in evangelism is well represented in the accompanying picture. A large number of young Japanese girls with their teachers are seen with Bibles and picture rolls in hand, starting out on a Sabbath afternoon to gather the children from the streets into Sunday School classes held in rooms rented for the purpose in various parts of the city. The man who is leading along the "baby or-phan" in his jinrikisha is an important figure in the community. These girls are prepared for their work by being themselves taught in the Sunday School the morning before, also in a teachers' meeting during the week. They are connected with the mission school of the Southern Methodist Church of the United States, located at Hiroshima, Japan, where there are seven hundred pupils, beginning with little tots in the kindergarten and covering all grades. We found that other girls' schools in Japan, particularly the Canadian Girls' School and the Friends' School at Tokio, were doing similar beautiful and humanitarian work.

A Sunday School Class Ready to Gather in the Child Waifs

Japan has several millions of children of school age, and ninety-five per cent. of them attend the government schools—public schools, as we call them. There are less than 100,000 connected with the Sunday Schools.

On the Sabbath the children fill the streets and parks, and are easily accessible to those who would gather them into the Sunday School, for Japan is thoroughly alive and up-to-date on the Sunday School question. On last May 10 to 12 there gathered in the city of Tokio a company of two hundred or more delegates from the different provinces of Japan for the purpose of organizing the Sunday School Association of Japan, thus coming into line with the organized Sunday School work of the world. On the closing day of the Convention, the largest hall in Tokio was filled with fifteen hundred children and their teachers. It was my privilege to be one of the speakers on that occasion. Indeed, I was requested to bear a greeting from the Sunday School children of Japan to the Sunday Schools of the United States. And this I now do through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

In response to this request let the Sunday Schools of the United States pray for the Sunday School movement in Japan, and let us fervently thank God that the work is already being so nobly and effectively wrought out by the Japanese themselves in their own land.

Since writing the foregoing letter, Mrs. Crafts and her husband have returned to the United States from their protracted foreign tour. Their occasional letters of travel in these pages have been an attractive feature for many readers.

Have you ever seen your feelings better portrayed than in the great picture Hovenden painted, called "The Breaking of Home Ties"? I have a fine copy of that picture hanging on my dining-room wall. Some people care the mother's face is the most wonderful part of that picture. Others draw your attention to the sister, or to the old grandfather's eyes. But the most suggestive part of that picture to me is the chin of the boy who is about to leave home. As I stand and look at that chin, I can almost see it quiver. It seems to say, "What am I going to do? Away from father and mother and all dear ones, where shall I spend my evenings? Who will take care of me when I am sick? Oh, I wish I did not have to go to that great big city, with all its temptations and loneliness. Why, there is no one among those city people whom I can call a friend." Yes, leaving home is no joke. Turning your back upon your youthful associations is no pleasure day jaunt. The "Breaking of Home Ties," when the young man starts forth in life to battle with the world alone, is one of the saddest moments in all life's journey.

Help in New Scenes

And yet was not this utter helplessness, this awful loneliness, this widening isolation, the means of bringing to you one of the most marvelous of divine revelations? When the revolving wheels of the railroad train were taking you farther and farther away from your old home, your eyes filled with tears. You were looking out of the car window. There you were offering this prayer: "O God, my mother's and father's God, be with me in my new life." Then when you closed your door for the first night in your little hall bedroom in the big city boarding-house, you knelt down and said the same prayer. And then what happened? You remember it as though it were yesterday. Your room seemed to be filled with singing angels. You knew not whether you were in the body, or out of the body, so wonderful was the celestial glory that shone around you. The same God who spoke to Joshua appeared unto you and said, "Fear not, my child; as I was with thy father and mother so will I be with thee, if thou wilt trust me and follow me." Was that vision a hallucination? You know it was not. You know it was a glorious revelation from God. Have you trusted Christ and followed him as you promised to do, when a young man on your first night in the great city? If you have not, then tell God to-day why you have not, and ask again for a renewal of his divine manifestation.

The Birth Angel

But time passed on. You soon got used to your city life. The green country ways wore off. The hob-nailed shoes were exchanged for the fine leather, the rough clothes of the village store for the fashionable productions of the expensive tailor. Then came your marriage. And that led on to another revelation—perhaps the best of all your life. Would you have me describe the scene? There is not much of a scene to describe. For some months you have been walking around with a careworn, anxious expression. The approach of a great danger to your wife's life oppressed you. What if she should die? You prayed, as you went about your work, that God would spare her life. Then suddenly a gleam of glorious light shot through the black clouds. After a while the white-capped nurse came out of the room and said, "You can come now. But you must step very gently. Yes, the doctor says she is going to get well, but she had a very narrow escape."

Then the nurse led you into a darkened room. Then she went over to a little crib and began to unroll a big bundle. She kept unrolling the bundle and unrolling it, until she finally came to a wee little bit of a face. As the nurse left, you bent over and looked intently at the child. Then a strange Divine Personality seemed to hover around that crib. A loving voice seemed to say: "Man, I have appeared unto thee before, but never with such earnest supplication as now. Knowest thou not that this little one is a gift from me to thee? He is bone of thy bone, flesh of thy flesh. Thou art responsible for his physical, mental, moral, spiritual and eternal welfare. What thou art he shall become. He is thine to mould and to fashion as thou wilt. Wilt thou renew thy pledge and give thyself and thy little one to me?" And standing by that new crib, you said, "O Christ, I will; I will; I will!" It was a glorious revelation from God. It was a holy pledge made to God. Have you kept that pledge? Can you not feel Jesus is by your side asking you if you have kept it? Will you keep it now?

I think you have had one other revelation. In your home you had a saintly presence that was a benediction to you and your family. Your widowed mother, whom you reverenced as almost more than mortal, whose gentle words, like the message of an angel, calmed you in angry moments and consoled you in trouble, was called away. Why were you so rapt as you sat by her casket that day of her funeral? Were you caught up then into another scene? For while I was speaking you could imagine that she had risen from her casket. Then she seemed to soar to

The Celestial Gates

Then, from the far-off distance, you seemed to see your father and your sister come out to greet her. You witnessed the rapture of their welcome. Then you heard your mother say, "Yes, Harry and Sarah have the farm. They are carrying on the work of the old church." "But," asked your father and sister, "how about Johnny?" "Oh," your mother answered with a heavenly smile, "he has not been living as he ought, but he is all right now. Just before I left my last bed of sickness, he said to me, 'Mother, tell father and Elizabeth that I will cease to live my old life of selfishness and sin. Tell them to be waiting for me at the Beautiful Gate, for I shall soon be there.' Yes," your mother cried, "Johnny, our dear Johnny, is coming too." Friend, was it a dream? Was it simply a visionary promise? Was it not rather a glorious revelation of your heavenly home coming? Friend, will you keep your promise to meet your dear ones at the trysting-place of the Beautiful Gate?

But after all, why speak longer about these divine manifestations of God's glory in the past? Cannot he give us a glorious revelation of his love and power now? Why, do you know, as I have been speaking to you to-day, Jesus seems nearer to me than he has ever felt before. He seems so near that I can almost see his hand touching you. He is so near that I can hear him whispering: "Son, daughter, my child, will you, like the returning prodigal, come home to my love?" Do you not see him? Can you not hear him? Will you not touch him? Will you not, as a repentant sinner, gladly accept this glorious revelation, and answer him, with a joyful heart, in his strength, "Yes, Master, I come and come now."

One Woman's Work for the Homeless

These Girls Walked 100 Miles in Search of a Home

THE work of caring for our family of one hundred and fifty at the Elhanan Orphanage, Marion, N. C., and enlarging the place, making room for more of the many who need a chance to equip themselves for lives of usefulness, and for the homeless little ones who need shelter, care and training, occupies every moment of our lives. We are finishing our present building and a large dormitory for young men and boys, and hope to be able to accommodate 300 next year, for they are coming; many of them with nothing—no comfortable clothing, no home, and sometimes not a trace of a relative.

The new demand is so urgent that the work grows in spite of us. Two little girls walked 100 miles in December hunting a home. One cold night they slept on the ground without cover, and the anxiety they manifested before they were admitted into the Home was pitiful. They are happy and appreciative, and are doing well. Both are good girls. Two or three pleading letters were received in behalf of another child, but we felt that we could not take more into the house until it was enlarged and we had more caretakers. We looked down the road and saw a man walking, while a two-year-old baby toddled along, making his way slowly to the door. The father had walked and brought this child 125 miles. The little one had no clothes except what he had on, and was very dirty.

After the death of two baby girls, who were brought into the home with death stamped upon them so deeply that we could only minister to them in their last moments, I asked the loving Father to give us others to take their places. Within less than two weeks, two children, a boy of two and his four-year-old sister, were found by Rev. L. B. Compton in the woods, in the suburbs of Asheville, N. C. The ground was their bed and the sky their cover, and they had not had a bath for days. They looked very little like human beings and they had never heard a prayer. They were sent to us. They were very badly run down, and needed much care during the first year; but the transformation in their lives is wonderful. They are well and as bright and promising as the average child. At four years of age the boy can quote three chapters in the Bible. He loves the services, and says he is going to be a preacher when he gets to be a man.

One girl of six walked fifty miles in search of a home. Three sisters came from an abode of the deepest poverty and were all physically so weak that the two older ones were months in the infirmary. Their three-year-old baby sister was never well, but slipped away to be with Jesus after months of suffering. Then there are a door-step baby—an abandoned baby—and a two-year-old afflicted girl, brought in arms fifty miles through the mountains. Some have neither father nor mother; others have lost one parent, and the home is broken up; and still others are deserted by both parents and are worse than orphans. All need a home and sch where they can be sheltered from sin, and loved trained for lives of usefulness.

For lack of room and of industries to furnish w for students to pay their way in school, and also want of teachers and caretakers, we have been c pelled to turn away about two hundred young pe and children who have applied for admission at E nan. In addition to enlarging our dormitories, necessary that we introduce industries to give a t for future use, to furnish work, to pay expenses w in school, and to make the institution as nearly as sible self-sustaining.

We are grateful to the Legislature of North Caro for an appropriation of $1,000 to the institution, an our friends and unknown supporters who have ad their contributions almost daily to meet the need the Home. The Lord bless and richly reward each We are also praising the Lord for giving us a trac fifty acres of land in Florida, where we are hopin open a school for our babies and an institution sim to the one at Elhanan for ne boys and girls. We feel this will be a blessing to work God has already place our charge. Surely the L is good to give to the poor which the rich obtain after great expense.

New avenues of access to people are opening to us. had the privilege this yea addressing two annual miss ary conferences, several dist conferences, and various stud bodies and congregations, still the invitations are m plying. In this way we h the opportunity of continu reminding the people that Gospel of the Kingdom is c mitted to our care as a tr and that we are a debtor to wide, wide world.

China After the Great Famine

WHEN the workers of the West, who obtain some of their information as to the work of the world from the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, came to the rescue of the Far East and gave of their comparative plenty to the relief of many hundreds of thousands of human beings of an alien race at that time afflicted with the direst poverty, it was perhaps the last thing to strike them that they were collectively effecting a stroke of statesmanship. They subscribed their money for the relief of the Chinese people; but that term mainly conveyed the suggestion of abating the incidences of starvation and of attempting to mitigate those horrors which are the purely material concomitants of famine.

Sentiment, imagination and endeavor rested at this point. Philanthropy was as satisfied as it could be. Charity threw her mantle over the labors of her devotees and their efforts were crowned with a success such as must be witnessed to be adequately appreciated. The starving human beings on the endless plains of Kiangpeh were fed, but the work of relief does not stop here.

Months ago I visited that country, and then the conditions were at their worst. For many thousands of square miles there was a waste of bare, wind-swept soil, in some parts covered with snow, in others still inundated by the floods of the destroying summer rains. Throughout this country there was a continual wailing, the moans and cries of a people in distress. Lately, I was again in that country, and I covered some of the same ground and all my original route. The country bourgeoned with crops in various stages of development. The land of Kiangpeh was itself again, its surface yielding that increase upon which man has lived from time immemorial.

But what was the initial material source of this increase? Where had the seed come from? And again in my mind's eye I could picture some of those fountains of fruition, the rolling grainlands of the middle West, the valleys of Maryland, the plains of Texas and Saskatchewan, and the hundred and one potential sources of supply from whence, perchance, this staff of life originated. But even before that seed was sown it had yielded a crop, because the example so set had been followed by the Chinese government in all its ramifications of family officialdom, and huge quantities of Asiatic seed had been poured into the country. Similarly, many hundreds of tons of food had been sent into the outlying districts away from the Grand Canal, which were difficult of access to the workers of the Relief Committees. Your stroke of statesmanship had borne fruit.

Continuing the journey up the Grand Canal, I was barely able to recognize it in places. For thirty miles up from its debouchure on the Yangtsze-kiang, the banks had been repaired in a manner worthy of all praise, both in an economic and a professional sense. This work is still proceeding. Again, this was the work of the Chinese government, and here again your stroke of statesmanship gives further material proof of its efficacy. At more points and centres of population than I can enumerate roads had been constructed, trees planted, water-ways opened up or dug, waste lands reclaimed and a hundred other permanent and necessary improvements effected in the condition of these people's existence. This work had been done by the local Relief Committees, Chinese and foreigner working together in harmony for the relief of suffering humanity. In a great measure, the men on the spot have been able to do this by your contributions. The humanitarian effect on the local Chinese has been incalculable. The famine and the efforts made at its re have been the means of opening their eyes as to value placed by others on human life as an asset.

China will soon be the greatest single consum market that the world has ever seen. Her 400,000, odd people inhabit a land of enormous wealth, b agricultural and mineral, which has not been scratch except superficially, and which requires all those me for communication and production upon which the p perity of the country and the happiness of its peopl much depend. From whom will China obtain these dustrial and economical necessities? Last year the ports of American goods to China had decreased to o half the value of those imported in 1903. Two ye ago a boycott was in force against your manufactu At present this market may not be of vital importa to you, but the enormous productive capacity of y country and people points to the obvious fact that y will soon need as many markets as you can get. Wit the past few months there has been a considerable vival in that trade, and at present it is impossible to definitely what proportion of credit is due to the w of the Central China Famine Fund.

Charity is a greater lever than jurisprudence, and charity of the West, in its unselfishness, in its vi and in its whole-hearted humanitarianism, has in so measure negatived the aftermath of distrust and de tation resultant from the old "might is right" policy the West towards China. Through all the spume a welter of ignorance and prejudice which have envelo the relations of the West and East, the light of greatest of all virtues has shone, bringing rescue to perishing and care for the dying in one great stroke statesmanship, the effects of which will be felt in ti long beyond our ken.

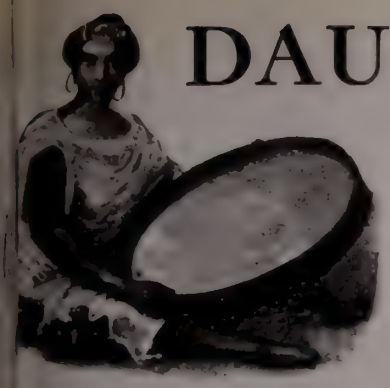
DAUGHTERS OF THE DESERT

Social and Domestic Life of the Mothers and Maidens of Morocco



Arab Woman Sifting Flour

Woman Grinding Corn

IF you were to enter the dwelling of a Berber Arab (the Kabyle), who has united with the Arabs of Morocco and of the desert against France, you would be startled at the resemblance of the Kabyle habitation to the antique khan—the inn or cave at Bethlehem, where our Saviour was born. The homes of the Atlas Mountains—that long and massive mountain wall that extends from the southern Atlantic coast of Morocco northeast to the littoral of Algeria—customs change not during the rise and lapse of centuries. The Berber Arab, or Kabyle of the Moroccan Atlas, builds his villages out of fragments of volcanic rock, sometimes of brick. Constructed without the slightest architectural principle, the dwelling is really only a stone cabin; but seen from a distance, the group of houses, sometimes seventy feet high, crowning a rocky eminence, or rising on the stern slope of the Atlas heights, is sufficiently imposing, and resembles a fort. When you enter, picturesqueness gives place to poverty. The interior, as I have said, bears a striking resemblance to the khan of Palestine. But here the similarity stops; the Light of the World has not yet penetrated the dwellings of the Atlas. The one-piece dwelling-room shelters the ox and the ass. The door is the only opening in the room, for there is no chimney; the earth is dug out in the corner for the kitchen fire, and the room accommodates man and beast; cows, goats and sheep have their own corner and wisp of straw.

A huge earthenware vases that recall like the ancient Egyptian's mortuary jars (the Canopic jars), the Kabyle mountaineer keeps wheat, olives and figs. The ground serves as the family bed. Sometimes a large straw mat is unrolled and spread out, as sleepy-time comes for the children; and in some Kabyle dwellings you will see a quaint kind of loft above the corner where are the cribs for ox and ass. This loft is carpeted with hay, but the aerial bed must be reached by climbing, by aid of the shepfold in the corner of the room. The furniture consists only of the necessary utensils for daily use—wooden spoons, plates, and vases of milk, for water and for honey. Here is the hand-mill, the identical type of the hand-mill that figured in one of Christ's parables—"two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left." In this mill they grind the wheat and the Indian corn for the famous Arab couscoussou, the most celebrated dish of the desert Arabs and of the Atlas mountaineers.

Now, it is from just such interiors that there issues to-day a force that is baffling and worrying the cabinets of Europe—the Mediterranean powers, so-called. The Kabyle mountaineer who has united with the Arab of Morocco, of the plains and the desert against the usurpurs of his throne—and likewise against the former Sultan of Morocco—in the wild fury that precedes, and probably, a general Mohammedan Djhad (holy war), has been nurtured by a mother whose nerves seem made of steel. The Kabyle, unlike the desert Arab, has but one wife. The Kabyle keeps no harem. And ardent is his patriotism and devotion to the doctrine of Mahomet, that at the call of the Djhad he divorces his wife, sells, literally, what he has, and throws himself into the fray. Drunkenness is unknown among the Kabyles, except at the time of the fig harvest. And then there is an Arab proverb, "drunk as a Kabyle gorged with figs." The Kabyle is brave, he is not a liar, he is industrious, he is a merchant, and he holds his racial nationality dearer than his life. On the Kabyle woman—on the mother and on the wife—devolves all the manual labor and the family hearthstone. The Kabyle woman not only grinds the corn, makes the couscoussou, nurses her children till they are three years old, but in every Kabyle home it is the women who weave the wool and make the burnoous, which is a plenary and steady article of commerce. She is brave as a lion, is the Kabyle wife, and often follows her husband to battle when the tribes are at war and incites him to courage by her presence and shoutings. In every other of the tribes there is always a prophetess, whose proud descent glances back over hundreds of years, and who is listened to with reverence. For the Kabyle woman has liberty not accorded to the Mohammedan Arab of the desert or of the cities. She wears no yashmak covering her face; she mingles in Kabyle society, and may be present at public festivals, her face unveiled. The Kabyle woman has auburn brown hair, blue eyes and a fair skin. Her long hair is never cut, and the simple garments that she wears in their picturesque folds add to the supple charm of her figure. When you first see her, however, you will start and probably stare at her with open mouth: on her forehead, sometimes concealed by a jewel that binds her turban, is a small tattooed cross. Often this tattooing is marked upon one nostril. A round jewel decorates the woman's turban in front. This is the radiant thabezimth, and the wearer shows, in its possession, that she has borne a son and given a defender to the tribe.

Glancing at the Arab tent, the whole life of these people of the desert plains (who are now fighting France) starts up in luminous silhouette. This is the nomad, the wanderer, the man whose gait is that of a thousand princes. He has come up from his oasis and his palms, and he is leaving his douar (village, collection of tents) to drive his steel into the throat of combined Europe, were it possible. The Arab of Morocco is the Chinaman of the West. While other Mohammedan States have tardily followed European progress, Morocco remains more isolated, impenetrable, mysterious than the great Celestial Empire. The Arab of Morocco sojourns in tents, he dwells in towns, but in his veins is the blood of the nomad. Unlike the Berber Arab (the Kabyle) the Arab of the desert plains has several wives; and these women are slaves of toil. But what strength! The woman of the desert bears a child at night-fall, and arises the next morning to cook the couscousson, and to saddle the horse. Not only does she weave the material of that striped tent, but she erects it as well, and she takes it down when the tribe must be on the march.

Arab Wedding Procession—Taking Home the Bride

It is startling to find among the Arabs of Morocco men and women who have names taken from the New Testament: Mariam (Mary); Aissa (Jesus). A well-known English physician relates that when he was traveling in Morocco, the Moors, both men and women, flocked to his tent (the women pleading through the habitual yashmak), crying to the physician as they related their different and difficult maladies, "The son of Jesus will help us!"

In picturesque old Fez, known as "the City of the Many Streams"—called Fas by the Arabs of Morocco—you forget the dirty, stony roads, the bad smells, the smothering dust in summer, as suddenly into a narrow lane emerges a marriage procession. A great confusion of people, lofty torches, flare of green palms attached to the bridal car; yells and the snapping and howling of dogs; more torches. There is the bridal car. The first thought that suggests itself to you is one of infinite pity for the brave little bride, cooped up and undoubtedly frightfully hot in that queer obelisk-like conveyance. How her heart beats! However, the moment approaches when her bridegroom will lift her veil and look upon her for the first time. Will he be enchanted by her face? On that moment depends the future happiness of an Arab maiden of the Morocco of to-day.

General Harrison's Toast

AT a public dinner to General (afterward President) Harrison, one of the guests rather conspicuously "drank to his health." The general pledged his toast by drinking water.

Another man offered a toast, and said, "General, will you favor me by drinking a glass of wine?"

The general asked to be excused. Being again urged to join in a glass of wine, he rose and said, in a dignified manner: "Gentlemen, I have twice refused to partake of the wine cup. Not a drop shall pass my lips. I made a resolve when I started in life that I would avoid strong drink. That vow I have never broken. I am one of a class of seventeen young men who graduated at college together. The other sixteen members of my class now fill drunkards' graves—all from the pernicious habit of wine-drinking. I owe all my health, my happiness and prosperity to that resolution. Would you urge me to break it now?"

Pope Pius on Modernity

ONE can scarcely expect of Pope Pius X. that he should be familiar with English history, but it would be well for him if some discreet friend were to call his attention to a well-known incident. Some flatterers of King Canute, we are told, tried to inspire in him an idea that he was supreme, not only over his subjects, but over the forces of nature. The shrewd monarch, desiring to administer a reproof of their fulsome adulation, had his chair placed on the seashore, and in his most majestic tones bade the incoming tide retreat. The waves of course paid no attention to his command and the king retreated to save his life. Pope Pius has probably never read of this incident, but it might suggest to him a timely lesson, which, if we may judge by his recent encyclical, he needs to learn.

The encyclical is launched against a tendency of his own church, which he styles "modernity." He does not precisely define the term, but intimates that it is "a synthesis of all heresies and the outcome of unlimited curiosity, presumption and individualism," coupled with ignorance or disregard of real Catholic science. The bishops are exhorted "to tear out of the hands of the faithful all bad books and all bad writings," and this he imposes on them not as a right, but as a duty. The bishops, aided by a council of censorship, are to be the judges of what books are bad. He gives them, however, a hint for their guidance by a vigorous denunciation of the modernist spirit. The teaching of philosophy and positive theology is to be conducted in the spirit of the Catholic Church, and all professors in colleges who do not obey the order are to be summarily removed.

A storm of protest has arisen from intelligent Catholics here and abroad against this intolerant manifesto. It is pointed out that it suppresses all inquiry and binds the church by fetters intolerable to intelligent men. It is a movement backward to the time of the Inquisition, which, if it had survived, would have been a suitable instrument for carrying out the Pope's behests. The modernity of that time had its representative in Galileo, and it subjected him to torture to compel him to retract his assertion that the world turned on its axis and went around the sun. He was told that his theory was opposed to Bible teaching and was necessarily an error, and the rack was used to convince him. Other scientists and scholars of a like type may now be found in every college, and the Pope, debarred from applying the rack, orders them to be removed from their chairs. Is it possible that this priest buried in the Vatican can suppose that the spirit of inquiry and research can be stifled by such measures? Neither he nor the Protestant divines who control their respective churches can so stereotype the doctrines of the time and say what men shall or shall not believe. The truth is great, and, no matter what the priests say, it will prevail.

Mr. Bonaparte's Plan

ATTORNEY-GENERAL BONAPARTE has the faculty of saying startling things. Speaking lately before the National Prison Congress in Chicago, he pointed out the steady growth of the class known as "habitual criminals"—a class which did not trouble our forefathers, who made short work of them. He regarded this class as the product of our modern civilization, and pronounced it the "inveterate enemy of society," unworthy of toleration. Coming sharply to the point, the distinguished Attorney-General declared that society should take steps to protect itself, and that when an offender had been convicted three times of major crimes, on the fourth conviction he should be executed.

Coming from any less notable quarter, such a proposition might easily pass unheeded, but it is altogether a different matter when it is set forth by the Attorney-General of the United States. It is true that crime is increasing and that all the rigors of the law do not seem to act as a deterrent in keeping the criminal classes in our great cities in subjection. In many cases the comparative ease with which serious crimes are committed, and the failure to detect and punish the perpetrators, have amazed the public. Immunity from punishment and the inability of the police to cope with the situation, have made the lawless class bold and reckless. It is certain that in some localities at least the criminal question has reached a point where new methods are needed to deal with it effectively.

Few will approve the Attorney-General's plan of depleting the ranks of crime and magnifying the terrors of the law by executing "fourth time" offenders. Some will regard as more reasonable and humane the establishment of penal colonies in some far-off American territory, where the perpetrators of major crimes may be safely kept in rigidly regulated communities, and compelled to work for support. They may point to the fact that in Alaska and other outlying territories there is ample room for such colonies, and that even the Philippines might be put to a worse use. Other nations have found such colonies an excellent means of relieving themselves of the immediate burden of criminal support. To see this burden steadily growing in the United States one needs only look at the ever-increasing number of jails, penitentiaries and State prisons, and the cost of maintaining criminal courts, judges and a vast army of police, for the regulation of crime.

At no distant day, the whole subject of the readjustment of the relations of the two classes—the honest and the criminal—must be considered. Meanwhile, instead of Mr. Bonaparte's project, which is a virtual confession that our civilization is a failure, we would suggest that the Attorney-General turn his attention to some plan which would keep humanity in view, while increasing the public safeguards for peace and comfort and reducing the heavy financial burden which the support of crime now imposes upon our communities everywhere.

A Lesson from the Jew

NEW YORK was the scene of an extraordinary religious spectacle on September 18. It was Yom Kippur, the commemoration of the Atonement—the most sacred day in the Jewish Calendar—and it was observed in the metropolis by more than half a million devout Hebrews. All Jewish places of business were closed. The Jewish working men and women left their wonted occupations. The Jews were to be found crowding the fifty synagogues and the hundreds of small chapels and private halls, in solemn worship. Some of the worshipers were shrouded and unshod, in token of their mortality and humility. There were shrouds among them that were worn almost to shreds, for they had seen many Atonement Days; but their wearers were not ashamed. To be buried in an old and tattered shroud is an honor to the Jew. And so, with praying, fasting, reconciliations and pious resolutions the day was spent.

Throughout the globe, wherever the Jew has a habitation, the sacred day was observed in similar fashion; but in New York, which has by far the largest Hebrew population of any city in the world, the observance was of the most pronounced type, and produced an unusual impression. It stirred the non-Jewish mind to inquire whether the Jew, in his religious duties, does not live up to his profession better than many Christians. How many thousands of these in every American city, who are Christian in name at least, honor their religion as the poor Jew honors his? Let a Christian festival come—the most sacred in our religion—and instead of observing it in the spirit of reverence and humility and exercising self-denial and spending the day in the Lord's house in praise and prayer, we find multitudes flocking to the popular resorts to pass the day in pleasure, or spending it at home in feasting and other indulgences.

We are not drawing invidious comparisons, yet we venture to assert that on Yom Kippur there was hardly a Jew at any of the public pleasure resorts in and around New York, certainly not an orthodox Jew. Could the same be said of a Christian holy day, whether it fell on a weekday or Sunday? Our Easters have become more of a dress parade than a season of spiritual rejoicing, and the general decline of Sabbath observance is too palpable to be denied. In such matters we might do worse than take a lesson from the Jew.

In School Again

IN these bright days of early autumn the children are back in school; the teachers, refreshed, have left the summer holiday behind them and are again engaged in their delicate task of moulding the minds and manners of little men and women. The future citizens of this great republic, the future legislators, governors, admirals, statesmen and commanders-in-chief, are at present bending over books and slates, standing up to recite, and absorbing knowledge at every pore.

The finest force in our civilization is the little schoolma'am modestly tramping back and forth to the monotony of her daily toil. Women far outnumber men in the ranks of educators and possess talents for shaping the lives of children in a measure seldom equaled by masculine instructors. Although the children do not dream it, they are living their happiest days in the untrammeled freedom from care and responsibility that is a part of their youthful age. It is true that they are under authority, that they cannot go where they please and do as they please without restraint from parents and teachers. Marching with this condition is that of full provision for their daily wants, so that the childish mind has no room for worry.

Would that we older ones were as free and happy as our children in matters that concern this transient world. For we well know, we who are older, that we shall always be in some sort of school-room, and always living beneath the sceptre of authority. There is no possible freedom for grown-up people any more than for children outside the beneficent dominion of law.

An Age of Change

IF the politcal systems of the great countries keep changing at the present rate, articles on government in our encyclopedias and geographies will have to be entirely revised within a short time. A little over a year ago, Norway decided she would like to steam as a ship of state under her own power, and, breaking the bond that connected her with Sweden, elected her own king. Russia has been endeavoring to create a representative body that could take an active part in the government of the country. Persia has just celebrated with great ceremony the first anniversary of the creation of the Persian Parliament. Now all eyes are turned with surprise to China, the country of all others that we regarded as having been asleep for centuries, whose civilization is so peculiarly its own that it has taken nothing from and given nothing to that of the West.

A number of Chinese officials of high rank have asked the Dowager Empress, the real sovereign, for a parliament. The two spokesmen were Chang Chih Tung, ex-Viceroy of Hankow, and the Viceroy Yuan Shih K. Their proposal has not been answered from the throne, but there are reasons for believing that it has met with favorable reception. The Imperial Government has shown itself unable to cope with local affairs successfully in provinces distant from Pekin, and the people undoubtedly feel that if they had a parliament they could voice their needs and secure relief much better than by the present methods. Undoubtedly the stress of the great famine has had much to do with intensifying this idea and also causing the people to look on foreign systems of government and foreign ways of living with much more friendly eyes. The relief afforded by America in the time of trouble has been a great lesson to them.

The liberality of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done much to break down the wall of Chinese prejudice and to bring in Western ideals. So, in a way, the Chinese Parliament becomes a fact, its creation may, in addition, be due in no small measure to this cause.

Persia's Parliament

WHAT parliamentary institutions have taken a deep hold on the people of the ancient kingdom of Persia is evident. The first anniversary of the summoning a Parliament was recently celebrated. It was a wise a of some one, whose identity has not been disclosed, collect the school-children of Teheran and take them the Parliament house to see the members pass in on auspicious occasion. The children will never forget spectacle, and it is likely to kindle in their hearts a e of liberty and constitutional government that may ne day have a decisive influence on the future of the ntry. The first year of constitutional government has been barren of results. The Parliament was well are of the basis of its power, and showed that it was e to maintain its rights. The new Shah proposed in a ewd way to diminish its power, but the Parliament, ng and inexperienced as it was, proved itself able to ing him to terms. It insisted that should admit that he was a constitual ruler and not an autocrat; that heads of departments should be ited to eight, and those responsible the representatives of the people. se with minor details were formally manded of the Shah before the Parlment would pledge allegiance to . He stubbornly resisted for a time, the representatives were firm and Shah deemed it prudent to grant that was asked of him. Victory all ng the line is the record for the liament in its struggle with the h for the first year of its existence, it has been equally successful in olishing the practice of selling apntments to office. We regret to rn that the leader in the struggle, chir-ed-Dowleh, died this month; there is good reason to hope that men whom he trained will continue good work. Unhappily there are al disturbances which may cause the ervention of foreign Powers; but it pears clear that whatever the issue y be, the people of Persia will never in be ruled, as in former time, by an ocrat. The experience of the peo- of Persia under despotic governnt was like that of the ancient acher:

ll this have I seen: . . . there is a time rein one man ruleth over another to his hurt. (Eccles. 8:9.)

Royal Financier

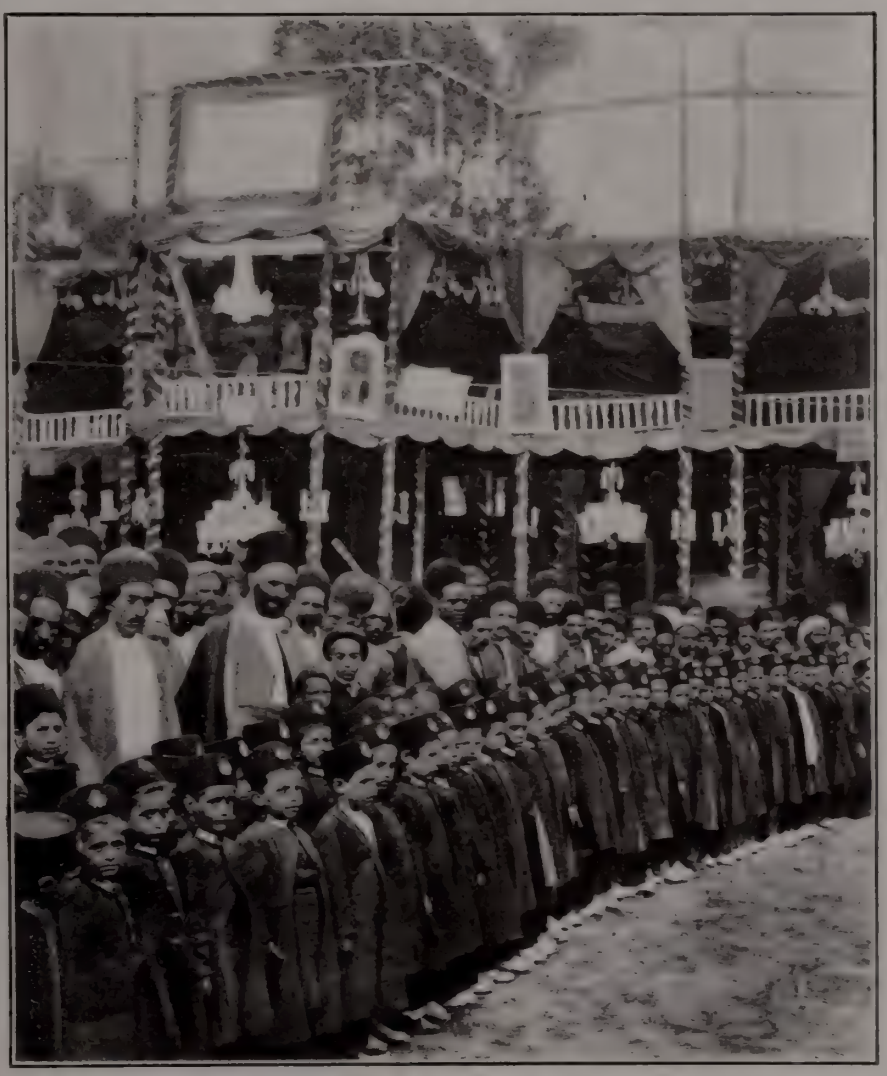
Bitter indignation has been aroused oughout Europe by an announcement ently made in a Belgian journal. sident missionaries and disinterested tors to the Congo Free State since as been governed by Leopold, King the Belgians, have given accounts horrible cruelties practised on the ives to compel them to collect rub-. Photographs have been published wing how the natives have been imed and brutally treated because y did not bring in so much rubber the king's officers demanded. The plaints were so persistent that the g suggested that the Congo State uld be annexed to Belgium and in are should be controlled by officers appointed by the nistry and the Belgian Parliament. This proposal hailed as a measure that would assure the Congo of government. While negotiations were still pending the transfer, the king has made an announcement ch defeats the objects sought. He states that he has nted a concession of the rubber districts for an indefie period to a company which will exploit them for its benefit. It has been learned that the company sists of the king himself and a few court favor-. He thus secures for himself and his minions that t of the Congo State which is the subject of scandal, ing to Belgium only that part which is practically rthless. It may be hoped that the Belgian Parliant, supported by the public opinion of Europe, will be e to defeat the king's project and wrest the control of oppressed natives from his ruthless hands. He is ewd and unscrupulous, and considers himself above the law, but forgets that there is One who is stronger than he who will yet bring him to judgment.

Your covenant with death shall be disannulled and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it. (Isa. 28:18).

Mistaken Identity

A citizen of Chicago has made a singular mistake. He met a lady on the street whom he claimed as his wife. She indignantly denied the relationship, but the man persisted. The case was eventually taken to court, where the man's statements were corroborated. His neighbors positively declared that she was his wife, and the identification was deemed complete when he brought his mother-in-law who swore that the lady was her daughter. The conflict of testimony was so puzzling that the judge adjourned the case. At the next hearing the mystery was solved. The man's real wife came to court from Elgin, where she had been visiting friends. When she and the lady stood together in court, the resemblance was so remarkable that the judge readily acquitted the witnesses of an intention to deceive, though he confessed his surprise that the husband and the mother should have been mistaken. It is the Christian's comfort that in the decisive matter of his identity, no mistake can be made.

The Lord knoweth them that are his. (II. Tim. 2:19.)



Persian Children Celebrating the First Anniversary of the Parliament

Permanent Passengers

A lady died suddenly on the steamer Etruria of the Cunard Line during its latest passage. She had made her home on the vessel for several years and had gone to and fro upon it on every voyage. It is remarkable that her mother had the same eccentric habit. For more than twenty years she had spent all her income in traveling back and forth between Ireland and America, seldom leaving the vessel for more than a day or two while it was in port. On this side she visited her daughter and in Ireland she went to the home of her girlhood. She died during a voyage, and her daughter yielded to the same longing for ocean travel. She secured the cabin her mother had occupied and took up her mother's life. Now she too has died as did her mother, on the vessel that had been a home to her for years. It was a strange fancy of these women to find rest and peace in voyages over the deep. We may hope that in their many journeys they did not forget that last change of residence that they, like all others, must make.

For we have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come. (Heb. 13:14, R.V.)

A Judge's Plea for Mercy

The case on trial in a New York court was that of a girl who had been in the employ of a Brooklyn lawyer as a domestic servant. She was accused of stealing a small article of jewelry and was convicted. She broke down in a flood of tears, and begged to be forgiven. It was her first offense, she said, and there were pathetic reasons for the temptation being peculiarly strong in the circumstances, and she promised with bitter tears never to transgress again. The judge's heart was touched and he determined to give her a chance to redeem the past. He committed her to a reformatory institution for two weeks instead of sending her to prison. The lawyer vigorously protested, and threatened to take the case to the District Attorney if the judge persisted in dealing so with the case. "It is wrong," he said; "she is guilty; she should go to prison; it is an outrage." The judge asked him if he had never done wrong in his life. "Never," he answered; "I insist on the law being executed." The judge replied, "You are a remarkable individual if you tell the truth in saying you have never done wrong. In any case I shall follow a law higher than this court, higher than the District Attorney — the law of mercy; and you may take what course you please." The unmerciful prosecutor evidently has a poor memory or a blinded conscience. It may be hoped that he will realize his own need of mercy before it is too late to seek it.

He shall have judgment without mercy that hath showed no mercy. (James 2:13.)

Defective Children

A startling report is made by a committee of prominent educators, chief among whom is Charles C. Burlingham, who have made a personal investigation of conditions in Boston, Chicago, and New York. The committee finds ground for believing that about twelve million children, or one-third of the school population of the United States, are physically defective from one cause or another. In some instances the cause is malnutrition, due to the poverty of the parents; but this cause exists in less than one-tenth of the whole number. A majority of the afflicted children suffer from defective eyesight, defective breathing, or enlarged glands. A large percentage of the defects may be easily remedied if dealt with in early childhood, and they might have been prevented by proper care. The committee suggests that a physical examination be made at once, and in every case of defect the parents be notified and remedial treatment recommended. It is also advised that hygiene be taught, so that the child may contribute to a course of life conducive to health. Most important, too, is it that the school buildings and school curriculum be carefully examined, so that the physical defects of the children may not be produced or aggravated by school attendance. It is a pitiful thing that children should be kept back in their studies by defects that could be remedied. We may hope that the investigation to be instituted will lead to their being relieved of this obstacle to their progress. What a good thing it would be if the prejudices they have inherited and the propensities that hold them back from moral progress could as easily be relieved.

All thy children shall be taught of the Lord; and great shall be the peace of thy children. (Isa. 54:13.)

HOW "DRUNKEN HOP" WENT HOM

A BOWERY MISSION STORY, BY JOHN G. HALLIMOND

A FEW weeks ago there appeared in a local paper, the Castilian, of Castile, Wyoming County, N. Y., the following notice:

Mr. Grant D. Hopkins, who left this place eleven years ago, and who now resides in New York City, is visiting friends in town for a week. One night, at the Bowery Mission, seven years ago, he became converted to Christianity, and since that time he has been one of the faithful, earnest workers in the Mission. For some time he has been in the employ of one of the largest woolen firms in that city. Mr. Hopkins will lead the Epworth League Service at the M. E. Church on Sunday night.

Many who read that paragraph could hardly believe their eyes. It was not difficult for them to recall the big, brutal, profane "Drunken Hop" of eleven years ago, whose cruel treatment of an aged father, and whose generally outrageous conduct, had resulted in hinted threats of rail-riding and tar-and-feathers, and in his leaving the community for the community's good. That "Drunken Hop" should be once more in their midst, a Christian man, and announced as the leader of the Epworth League meeting, was almost too much for them. "If such is the case, then surely the day of miracles is not past," said one to another, as they wended their way to the little church.

Yes, there he was. A new man certainly, but "Hop" sure enough. A gentlemanly figure, well dressed and dignified in bearing. Three years' military experience in the United States Army had made a wonderful change in the ungainly loafer of a dozen years ago; but the voice—who had a voice like that but "Drunken Hop"? That settled it; it was "Hop" sure enough.

He had already spoken the previous Wednesday evening in the M. E. Church at Warsaw, N. Y., where the Rev. C. M. Hall, the pastor, had cordially welcomed him. Warsaw was his birthplace, and the birthplace of his mother before him, but the major portion of his after life was spent in Castile. This unexpected visit, therefore, caused as much excitement as wonderment.

Grant Hopkins came to the Bowery Mission on December 1, 1899, and was soundly converted to God that evening. He was a most deplorable-looking object, the very picture of hopeless despair. He told us he had tramped to New York from Buffalo, but he had the appearance of having been rolled in the mud all the way across the State. Although a big, husky fellow, he seemed utterly exhausted physically, and barely able to lift his feet from the ground. Dirty, tired, footsore, hungry and homeless—that was his condition on that memorable night. He was crushed down under an awful sense of wrong-doing and shame.

He had been brought up by Christian parents, had been a scholar in the Sunday School and a member of the church; but drink and bad companions had brought about his downfall, until, going from bad to worse, he became one of the most abandoned men in Wyoming County. He was a notorious scoffer at religion. On a Sunday morning, in a state of semi-intoxication, he would wait for his neighbors coming from church and revile and shock them by his brutal profanities. He took a delight in putting younger men through a course of education in drinking, swearing and Sabbath-breaking. Every penny he earned he expended in rum and cards, and finally filled the cup of his enormities to the brim by selling his household furniture and turning his aged and helpless father into the street to starve.

It was these bitter memories that crowded in upon his mind on that memorable night in the Mission, until he cried out in the extremity of desperation: "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

That night he walked the streets, a stranger in the great city, no roof to cover him. But the load was gone; he was God's child; he was "begotten again unto a lively hope."

He became a most earnest worker in the Mission. Although his material prospects were anything but encouraging, he never let go his hold upon God. Not finding suitable employment here, he enlisted and spent three years in the Philippines.

His enthusiasm for Christ was such that his first act on returning to the States, in the Presidio in San Francisco, was to speak at an open-air meeting of the Volunteers of America, and on getting his discharge he at once settled in New York and became one of the regular leaders of the Mission.

Then came the most trying circumstance of his life. God had given him a beautiful, devoted Christian wife, who was in full sympathy with his spiritual yearnings and work. They had barely been married a year when she was taken from him. He made his way at the first opportunity to the Mission, for he said: "I want you fellows to see how God's grace can keep a man under the heaviest blow that can fall upon him. The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Since his wife's death he has been filled with a desire to "go home and tell" what a wonderful salvation God has bestowed upon him.

A special meeting was held in his behalf, prayers were offered for him, and on his return the hall was crowded to hear his report of what had happened.

The following is the testimony he gave: "A week ago last Monday, two weeks ago to-day, I left this city with a heavy heart. I did not expect to meet any one who would show me any great cordiality, except those, perhaps, with whom I had been drinking in former days, and, men, my heart began to sink. I began to get more depressed as I arrived near the town. I wanted to take in the sights, and see if any of the old dwellings had changed, or if I could see any of the boys. I wondered whether I should meet any one t knew me, and one of the first I met was a man t I told once, when he came and asked me to vote temperance ticket, that I was not bound to tell man how I voted, and that if he minded his own b ness he would do a great deal better. He claimed t he had forgotten what I said. But, men, whether had forgotten I do not know, but I know that ev one of the business men along that street in that t where I went to school put out a hand of welco and was glad to know that I had turned to the cause Christ, and had become a worker here on the Bowe

I told one of them who wanted to kn what I was doing, that I was serving C for a living, and working in a woolen s to pay expenses, and so I am. It is living to serve God. Many years bef I had spent all for rum and at the c table. I stayed in the town a little wh that evening and one young fellow ca to me, and I will never forget the expr sion on his face as I said to him, 'D you know me?' And he said, 'Yes, I kn you,' calling me by name. He said, 'H are you getting on?' I said, 'All righ He asked me if I remembered the f drink he ever took and who gave it to h I said I did. He said, 'I do not dr now.' And I replied, 'Neither do I, a I have not drunk any in seven years.' said, 'I do not believe it,' but I proved t to him before I left him. Oh, how I tha God that I could tell him that Jesus Ch had helped me to overcome the appetite rum! I went to one place where they s I was of no use and that the grace of C would never be able to save men like m I walked into that place. They st back and looked at me. They didn't kn me. They had forgotten me. I said them, 'Don't you remember a man t used to run around this town on Sund mornings, especially about twelve or o o'clock, drunk, and that he was pronoun a vagabond, and that it was said C would never save that man?' 'Yes,' th said, and then I told them that I was man. And I said, 'I found someb down in the great big city of New Yo on the Bowery, who told me that grace of God could save me and mak man of me, and here I am to show y what the grace of God can and did do Hopkins' life.'

"As I left that place to come up where I had left my father, or where I d serted him, the first one I met was the m who took charge of him after I had le He said, 'Well, can it be that you are s alive?' I said, 'Yes.' 'After all your l of sin you are still alive?' I said, 'Y thank God, and it has been seven ye since I took a drop of liquor.' He said, do not know, I rather doubt it.' I sa 'Yes.' By the way, I had papers in m pocket to show what I was saying, and very quickly showed him them, and h said, 'Why, the last time I saw you thought there was no hope for you. thought the day of grace had passed f you.' I said, 'Down in old New Yo where sin abounds, in the biggest th oughfare of the city, there is a lighthou and when I was almost gone I got in the and they snatched me as a brand from t burning, and I am here to tell you that Jesus Christ h kept me ever since.' I waited one day to see an friend who in her busy life one would think would ha nothing to do with me. While waiting she came alon and seeing me she said, 'I do hope my prayers are a swered,' and I said, 'Yes, thank God.' She knew m as my Sunday School teacher, she knew me when I w in the church, and when I was a leader in the Epwor League. She came to me, grasped me by the ha and said, 'There is nobody I would like to see any be ter than you to-day, because you have proved to m that the days of miracles are not past.'

"I thank God that he has permitted me to go hom to my mother's home, and tell them that Jesus Chr has saved me. And, men, what Jesus has done in m life, if you will only come to him, he will do for you

"THROUGH THE GIN-MILL DOOR"

By G. ALLAN SYKES

HARK the piteous wail of anguish
From the struggling human race;
Day or night it never ceases,
And its source is plain to trace;
Comes this cry of grief and trouble,
Rising from the floods that pour
Squalor, vice, remorse and hunger—
Through the Gin-Mill Door.

Daily, ghastly news appals us—
Passion, murder, theft and pain;
Courts, asylums, jails o'er-crowded,
Broken heart and ruined brain.
Homes and prospects gone forever,
Thus we read the gin-mill lore:
Weeping wives and children blighted—
Through the Gin-Mill Door.

Through this door come sons and husbands,
With fresh curse and chains to bear;
Honor, work and health and wages
Changed for shame and sorrow there.
Countless thousands, broken, yielding;
Weakened now, though strong before;
They had lost their strength and courage
Through the Gin-Mill Door.

WORKING THROUGH COLLEGE

HUNDREDS of students in the various colleges and universities throughout the country are "working their way through." This indeed means the pursuit of knowledge in the face of stacles. A great many actual instances can be ined where young men have paid not only all their tion fees, but all their living expenses, through a col- e course, by earning money between recitations, or their leisure time. Many young women students e achieved practically the same feat in self-support, ing their living expenses by earning money in out- e work, and oftentimes paying in addition half their tion fees.

The empty purse! There is the greatest obstacle t confronts many a college student, especially in second year. Reverses and death have depleted family exchequer, and there is doubt as to the rce of the means to defray the expenses of the son or ughter at college. For those in such plight there a way to begin and to sh an education, even one of the great univer- es like Yale, Harvard, nceton, Cornell or Co- bia. This way is the of work. At least $400 $500 are needed by the dent for tuition, living enses, board, etc., each r. How can the neces- money be earned? t what forms of employ- nt are open for the pur- e? How can a young n or woman work a way ough college?

n the first place, a num- of colleges conduct reg- r employment bureaus. s is usually managed er by the college Y. M. A., or by a special com- tee from the faculty. ese bureaus make a busi- s of finding positions for dents not only within the fines of the institution, he office of the business nager, the auditor, or registrar, but also in ious establishments out- e of the university itself.

'Don't bother to put your trousers under your mat- s, when you can have them pressed the whole year $2.50." This notice was posted on the various bul- n boards at one of the Western universities. The erprising student who undertook to press, clean and p in order the clothes of his fellow-students made ut $200 a year.

The former head of the students' employment bureau Columbia, Mr. Reuben Myers, tells of a typical case the struggles of poor students in paying their through Columbia. When a certain student t came to Columbia he had only $100. The for the first term amounted to $87. His first em- yment was that of waiter in a student boarding- se, in return for which he received his board. As he physically strong, he soon found work as a helper a furniture van, for Saturdays, at $2 a day. He was s assured of his room and board. Through industry perseverance and optimism he succeeded in getting various other jobs, netting a dollar or two each. His athletic proclivities made him a desirable person for the evening recreation work of the Board of Education, through which he secured a position as assistant teacher at $9 a week. His salary was soon increased to $15, and later he was again promoted, and received a salary of $25 during the remainder of his college course. The experience of this particular student indicates what can be done by the capable and willing.

Students often go into the business of storekeeping. Three or four students enter into a partnership, using one of their own rooms for the purpose, and stocking it as a college book store. At a number of colleges the students conduct second-hand furniture stores. The furniture is bought at a very low price from graduates and is then sold to freshmen at a fair profit. Enterprising students act as agents for clothing and furnishing firms, who entrust the young men with a stock of goods, allowing them commission on all of the sales.

Seniors of the University of Pennsylvania on Class Day

A number of students earn $100 or more a year by working as stewards and janitors in college fraternity houses. Others act as collectors for merchants of the town, earning a commission on each dollar collected; others act as canvassers for the various articles of merchandise needed by students. Next to teaching, a favorite professional calling among college students is that of typewriting and stenography. In this work a student can make $250 during a college year. Then comes newspaper work. In this field money can be earned if the student be a ready writer. Students holding editorial positions on college newspapers are given a share in the profits of such sheets. Students also work as extra reporters on the local newspapers. When the college is located in a large city, students often earn a good weekly salary by covering the news of the college. This work is paid for at space rates, from $3 to $8 a column.

Students who have good voices form a college glee club and give concerts in various cities. The profits are divided among the members of the club. Individual singers also often secure engagements in the choirs of the local churches, receiving from $2 to $5 a Sunday. Banjo and mandolin clubs are formed for the same purpose of self-support. Even orchestras have been organized and have given high-class performances, one notable case being that of an orchestra made up of Columbia University students playing every evening in one of the largest hotels in New York.

At Cornell many students find means of self-support by tending furnaces for professors and townspeople. The compensation for this service is $5 or $6 a week. At this university the Christian Association helps needy students in the search for work in a very practical way. Last year this association helped nearly 400 students to work, aggregating in value $13,000. At Columbia last year, students who were working their way through the various schools of the university earned the surprising sum of $104,000. Scores of students at Leland Stanford, Cornell, Brown, Chicago, Princeton, Syracuse, Amherst and Michigan universities are making money "doing chores." A student at Baker University says that he earns over $50 a year by working in gardens and cleaning yards for householders near the college.

One student at Syracuse University tells of earning money in no less than eight or ten different ways during his college course. On Saturday evenings he worked in a store at $1 a night. On Sundays he pumped a church organ, earning fifteen cents an hour. He mowed lawns for twenty-five cents for each front lot. He took care of a furnace for $1 a week. He performed other odd jobs in private houses at twenty-five cents an hour. He ran errands at twenty-five cents per trip. He acted as tutor at the rate of one cent a minute. Thus he worked his way through college for four years.

The harvest time for the self-supporting student is, of course, during the vacation months in summer. Fourteen students from Leland Stanford, Pacific, California, and other Western universities, earn $70 a month all summer acting as watchmen at the snow-sheds on the Southern Pacific Railroad, in the Sierra Nevada Mountains. In late years, many a student of a mechanical turn of mind has earned as much as $100 a month acting as chauffeur. The Columbia University employment bureau cites the case of one very ambitious man who for two years has earned enough money in summer as the driver of a motor-car, to pay all his expenses during the winter at college.

And now, about the woman college student. Is the door of opportunity open for her to work her own way through college? I asked this question of members of

GOD OPENS A WAY

*International Sunday School Lesson for October 13, 1907, by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE key words of the book of Joshua are: Promise, Preparation, Possession. We have reached the point where the end of preparation is to pass into the beginning of possession. The purpose of the book is not chiefly history or biography, but to give the story of a promise, proclaimed by God, prepared for and possessed by man, and to show in the history of that one promise the eternal principles and laws that apply to all God's promises.

Let us then use the Bible sword fearlessly and faithfully. What a weapon it has proved for defense and attack! Dr. Joseph Parker says of it: "There is none like it for ease of carriage. There are weapons that are very difficult to carry; but the sword of the Lord is not one of them. There are weapons of war very intricately constructed and very difficult of management, very cumbrous and altogether oppressive. Consider how little a book the Bible is, and regard that circumstance as one of the finest proofs of its presumptive inspiration and adaptation to the wants of man. Given the Encyclopædia Britannica as a work of inspiration for the guidance of men, and who could have read it? Instead of Being the largest of the volumes in our library, it is in some respects the smallest. 'The kingdom of heaven is like to leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal.' The Word of the Lord is short as to extent, is compassable as to magnitude, yet who can exhaust it? Take it as a whole; abide by it in its entirety; strike with the whole force of it."

The Word of God

Don't read the Bible; study it. Much Bible reading is no better than counting the beads of a rosary, done to fulfil a vow or keep up a custom, like the reading of one of two lady teachers represented in the following conversation:

"What are you reading now, Nell?" "Oh, I don't know," was the reply, "but I'm reading my one hundred and second book since last September." "My! I've read but ten the whole year. How can you find the time?" One teacher had read on an average ten books a month, the other but one, yet the latter was by far the more intelligent, and a much better conversationalist. One read to kill time, the other for profit.

The reading that has no reference to living is also of little use, even though it be Bible reading. That was a splendid custom in a certain home where a mother regularly selected some practicable verse of Scripture to be repeated by the whole family as a breakfast motto, and was wont to say, "Now let us make the text work to-day and report the results to-night." "The Bible was first a life before it was a literature, an experience before it was an expression," as Bishop McDowell is wont to say, and therefore should be studied with reference to turning it again into life. Let this story of Joshua be a lesson not only learned but lived again by our own Bible study, our own courageous battling with wrong in us and about us, our own efforts to lead others into the Land of Promise.

Preparation for Possession

"Having, therefore, these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." There were yet other acts of preparation for life and work in the Land of Promise, even after the Jordan was crossed. Circumcision, the passover, the review of blessings and curses at Ebal and Gerizim. We never get so strong in grace that we do not need daily preparation for service by prayer, including Bible reading, and by the sacraments and services and fellowship of the Church. How long is the training of the athlete for his short day of action, which fails if the preparation has not been thorough! How long, from childhood into early manhood, the student trains his mind for his life work! Surely for spiritual service we should train not less faithfully.

"Take up the ark of the covenant and pass over." Here we see that God would not have us linger too long in mere preparation, but go forward in service. Action is itself preparation for further action. A doctor, asked by a patient to tell him frankly of his condition, made a zigzag line, showing frequent upward turns of partial recovery, but a steady, downward movement, that could have but one result. Israel's history had been a zigzag line for forty years of wandering, sometimes toward and sometimes away from the Land of Promise, but it was now to take a final upward tendency that, in spite of frequent backslidings, would lead on to the development of a nationality that should be the world's teacher in religion. Many who read this lesson should translate it into the performance of some neglected duty. They have long confronted and evaded it, approaching it, then turning away, as Israel from Canaan. Let this zigzag experience be terminated. The obstacles are great, but greater is he who gives the order, "who also will do it" in us and for us. "Take up the ark of the covenant and pass over."

Promised Victory

"He will without fail drive out the Canaanite and the Hittite." From preparation we go back again to God's promise. To-day he promises that he will drive out of our hearts the Amorite of anger and the Hittite of hatred, and the Jebusite of jealousy, and the Perizzite of pride. "Greater is he that ruleth his spirit than he who taketh a city." This conquest of the soul is seldom won in one battle. A little girl, whose besetting sin was impatience and quick temper, prayed to God to cure her, and expected never to sin again. An hour afterwards, when she found the old foe was back again, she looked up impatiently and said, "O God, I asked you to make me a good girl, and why didn't you do it?" More reasonable was the little boy who prayed, "O God, make me a good boy, and if at first you don't succeed, try, try again."

"The people removed from their tents to pass over Jordan." Almost forty years before, the Israelites had been at the borders of Canaan, but had lost it by their foolish doubts. This generation was to enter in. Thus we are reminded that children need not repeat the sins of their fathers. Heredity is mighty, but faith in God may overcome it. Degeneration is more than countermatched by regeneration. This Jordan scene pictures the impressive contrast between opportunities lost and opportunities seized. The same opportunity that one man misses and goes back to die in the wilderness, when it comes to another man is improved and leads to true success. In the very teaching of this lesson many a boy and girl will come to the Jordan of decision, from which some will turn back forever to the wilderness, while others go forward to the Land of Promise. Let us do Joshua's part to lead them in.

A Type of Conversion

Most of the transitions of life are gradual and unconscious. But there are also great crises when all the powers of the soul are summoned for the crossing of the Jordan. It may be the choice of an occupation, or of a wife, or a political or religious choice that will affect the whole future.

The crossing of the Jordan has ever been a favorite picture of the great choice we call conversion. To many of us even that great choice was gradual, but to those who have been brought up under false faiths and can turn from them only at the cost of persecution, conversion is indeed "one more wide river to cross." In Bohemia, a poor boy, apprenticed to a shoemaker, being sent [illegible] customer with a package, was there given one of [illegible] excellent picture leaflets of the Children's Special [illegible] vice Mission of London, in his own tongue, entit[illegible] "Glad Tidings." On one of its pages there were s[illegible] Bible texts that greatly interested him. His Ro[illegible] Catholic parents and master had never allowed hi[illegible] read the Bible, but now he longed for a complete [illegible] Testament, and, on his saying so, the next time he [illegible] sent to the home where he got the leaflet, he was gi[illegible] one. He read it eagerly, but his master soon discove[illegible] it, and threw it on the fire. He told the giver of [illegible] loss, and was introduced at the Y. M. C. A., where f[illegible] while he read a borrowed Bible in peace. Soon he [illegible] another of his own, and when engaged to blow an or[illegible] in a Roman Catholic Church, found time between [illegible] tasks, in his nook behind the organ, to read his cheris[illegible] Testament. A change of masters placed him with a [illegible] verted Romanist, who rejoiced to aid him in his B[illegible] study. A Bible colporteur was wanted. It was a pl[illegible] of danger, but he took it, and not only sold the Bi[illegible] but explained it so effectively that he was called to pre[illegible] the glad tidings to his people. In such courageous d[illegible] sions we see the spiritual meaning of crossing the Jord[illegible]

A Test of Obedience

"When the feet of the priests were dipped in the br[illegible] of the water, the waters which came down from ab[illegible] stood and rose up in one heap." What a splendid [illegible] ture of obedience! God [illegible] promised to open a [illegible] through the flooded rive[illegible] he had opened a way throu[illegible] the sea for their fathe[illegible] Then he gave the orde[illegible] march forward, while [illegible] river still flowed as swi[illegible] as before. On they we[illegible] those men of faith, until th[illegible] feet were in the very br[illegible] of the river. Then God h[illegible] ored their faith by open[illegible] their way. "All Go[illegible] biddings are enabling[illegible] Every command enfolds [illegible] implied promise that C[illegible] will give us power to ob[illegible] When Jesus sent the [illegible] lepers to the priests, wh[illegible] implied that they would [illegible] cleansed by the time th[illegible] got there, it is written, "[illegible] they went they w[illegible] cleansed." So, as [illegible] priests went forward in o[illegible] dience God cleared th[illegible] way. The Psalmist, rec[illegible] ing this scene and that [illegible] the Red Sea, beheld Is[illegible] el's invisible King leadi[illegible] them on in both cases, a[illegible] exclaimed, "What ail[illegible] thee, O Sea, that thou fl[illegible] dest? Thou Jordan, th[illegible] thou wast driven back[illegible]

"Behold, the ark of the covenant of the Lord passeth over before you into Jordan"

In this duplicating of the great miracle that had be[illegible] wrought through Moses, God was fulfilling literally [illegible] promise, "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee[illegible] And to us this incident pictures the promise: "Wh[illegible] thou passest through the waters [of trouble], they sh[illegible] not overflow thee."

In the sermons and songs of the ages, the Jord[illegible] stands not alone for conversion, but especially for per[illegible] and troubles through which God safely leads us.

> When through the deep waters I call thee to go,
> The rivers of sorrow shall not overflow.
> For I will be with thee thy troubles to bless
> And sanctify to thee thy deepest distress.

Crossing the Jordan was not the end, but only t[illegible] commencement of Israel's conquest, and so the Jorda[illegible] strictly construed, pictures not the end of our confli[illegible] with sin at death, but the great beginning of our co[illegible] quest of sin in conversion.

Out of the dry river bed of the Jordan twelve ston[illegible] were taken and piled up on the Canaan side as [illegible] memorial of the miracle. Let us construct a memori[illegible] of God's mercies to us with the following twelve stone[illegible] Life, Food, Raiment, Home, Friends, Reason, Affli[illegible] tions, Forgiveness, Prayer, Bible, Comforter, Chris[illegible] The high priest bore twelve precious stones, representir[illegible] the twelve tribes of his people, on his heart. There w[illegible] should bear our friends in prayer before God, our cou[illegible] try also, praying that it shall follow God.

The personal applications of this lesson are but illu[illegible] trations. Its direct application is to national life. [illegible] somewhat parallel story is that of Julius Cæsar, a popu[illegible] lar general, of whom the Roman Senate was jealous, an[illegible] bade him confine his operations beyond the Rubicon. [illegible] was a crisis for Cæsar and for Rome when he disobeye[illegible] that order by crossing the Rubicon and swiftly marchin[illegible] his victorious army to Rome and driving out Pompey[illegible] who had superseded him in the confidence of the Senat[illegible]

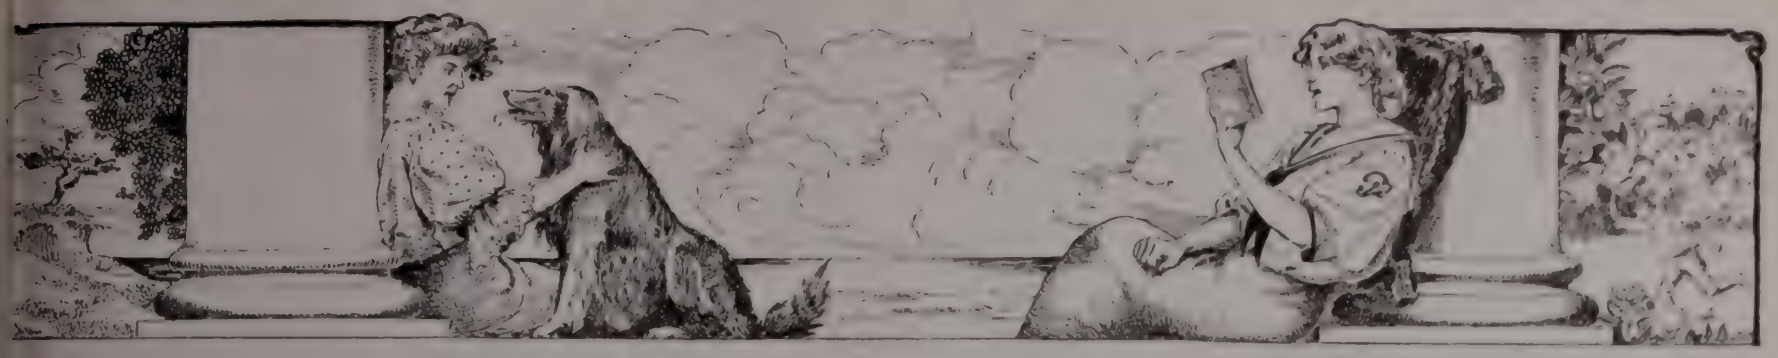
ON THE COOL HOME VERANDA



Household Drudgery

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

F the day ever dawns in which housekeepers in a given locality shall combine, have a common plant, so that a dozen homes may be furnished with meals from one kitchen, and the washing and ironi of the same number be carried forward in a single ndry, the prosaic drudgery that now wears women will be a thing of the past. From Monday's rub to urday's scrub, what with the cleansing of clothing, baking of bread, the continual sweeping, the oftneated dusting, the dry rubbing and polishing, the ng of a thousand little things and not a few large ngs, woman's work is a formidable enterprise. Probly because women are conservative and hold fast to ideas it will be a long time before the element of diffulty is eliminated from the domestic problem. At the ment, countless women are drifting into nervous prostion, because they have too much to do and too little ength with which to do it. We are told over and over t the grandmothers worked jt as hard as the grandghters, that they made no nplaint, kept house with e, and this when they had t minimum of modern conveniences and appliances of a bor-saving character.

Suppose we investigate beie accepting the statement true with regard to the ndmothers. No doubt re were notable matrons ty years ago, and no doubt y furnished their tables h food of the best, and t their good men forth to daily fray with immaculeshirt bosoms and stiffly rched collars. So far, so od. But in the simple item setting the table and washthe dishes, the ladies of past were immensely betoff than the ladies of the sent. A single plate, cup d saucer, used to serve the linary person at breakfast d supper, and at dinner, merly a midday meal, a ond plate for dessert was only addition. Meats and getables, bread and butter, kles and preserves found om on a single plate. Our eals to-day are largely ved in courses. Bread and tter plates are universal, ad is never served except a separate plate, and the plest meal may require a family of six from fifty sixty dishes; all of which to be washed, rinsed, ed and put away three es a day, the year round. We have the advantage of beautifully set tables, with amental centre-pieces, doilies and flowers, beautiful ina, cut glass and silver, but unless we care for these usehold treasures ourselves, they speedily find their y to the scavenger's cart or the rubbish heap. Servts are proverbially not to be trusted with delicate ina and costly glass. Southern matrons, than whom finer housekeepers have ever existed, invariably shed their own breakfast things at least, counted their ver and took an active part in looking after the family en, but in ante-bellum days they had a staff of house rvants who had been carefully trained and were never a hurry.

The colored maid of to-day and the colored butler are th inferior to the prototypes. As for the importations m Russia, Sweden, Denmark and Syria who are now ding their way into American kitchens, they are unfeakably trying to those who attempt to train them, d the instant they are trained, they leave their unfortnate mistresses in the lurch, while they seek easier ices and higher wages. There seems no immediate y out of domestic drudgery unless it can be found by licious combination, by scientific methods and economy of fuel and force, by recourse to a common kitchen and laundry.

The nicer parts of housekeeping are dear to the feminine soul. Most women enjoy keeping a house in order, attending to its decoration and arrangement and looking after the simple work essential to the comfortable care of bed-rooms. In many towns the work of house-cleaning has gradually fallen into the hands of men, who may be engaged by the day, and who wash windows, clean floors, beat rugs and attend to the renovation of carpets with a strength and thoroughness not to be found in women offering themselves for similar work. The weekly, monthly or quarterly house-cleaning that has taken the place of the former annual earthquake is well and on the whole cheaply done by these masculine recruits. Japanese and Chinese domestics are found satisfactory by many householders, who, having tried them, no longer hesitate to prefer masculine to feminine service. Occasionally, a versatile Frenchman is willing to undertake the office of general house servant, and if trustworthy and capable, he is a real lifter of the daily burden.

The woman who does her own work with the aid of her daughters is in a position of rare independence, if only the drudgery do not compel her to forego many pleasures and recreations that would keep her and the girls youthful and cheery, and save her from growing too early worn and weary. A day is coming when instead of sweeping we shall have portable machines and compressed air to do our cleaning for us. There is a good time coming for the housewives of the later twentieth century.

AN OLD VIRGINIA HOME

THE two old gentlemen in this charming picture of a beautiful old home at Red House, Virginia, are good specimens of the courtly-mannered men of the old school. Mr. E. D. McAfee has been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for thirty years, and reads the paper from the first to the last page with the same interest that he felt a generation ago. Opposite him sits a brother from New Orleans whom he last saw forty years ago, and whom he had supposed to be dead. The two old brothers have renewed their youth in many a genial reminiscence, and their juniors often laugh at the jolly tales the old fellows tell. Long may they live and prosper, and very cheery may their pathway be to the setting sun.

A Neglected Talent

ACCOMPLISHMENTS, by which, when the word is used concerning a girl's education, ornament rather than utility is contemplated, have not a very conspicuous place at this hour. We pay more attention to mathematics than to music, to manual training than to painting and water colors, to chemistry than to making artificial flowers. The ornamental branches, so to speak, are out of fashion. Thanks to a recurrence of common sense, nobody is now satisfied with a smattering of anything, and a little French, a little Italian, a slight acquaintance with drawing, and the ability to play a few showy pieces on the piano, are considered of no value whatever. This is as it should be. Intellectual discipline and the ability to use tools are the requisites sought for by sensible women and men in the training of their daughters. One beautiful and charming accomplishment once well nigh universal and still within the reach of everybody is, alas! much neglected by parents and teachers, and its absence affords reason for regret, if not for lamentation.

Nobody learns to read any more, and the art of reading aloud has retired into the shadowy region of other lost arts. Even public speakers, part of whose duty it is to read with distinctness and expression, frequently read very badly. There is less agreeable reading in the pulpit than there should be, and in the parlor and the family circle the person who can read aloud acceptably and delightfully is at a premium. Less attention is paid in school to reading, including enunciation, vocalization, and interpretation, than is desirable. To find a young woman who can read an essay, a story, a review, a magazine article or a chapter in the Bible to the pleasure of her hearers is really so great a treat that words are hardly adequate to its description.

In order to the acquisition of an accomplishment that would add immeasurably to the joy of life, training should begin early. Children should be encouraged to read aloud. They should also be allowed to listen to reading, and some portion of each evening should be religiously devoted to this occupation.

A family of very unusual culture and intelligence had the good fortune to be brought up in a home where books abounded, and in which the father required every son and daughter not only to read a certain number of pages each day, but to read aloud in turn a little while every evening. Whether guests were present or not the family rule was never broken, and only in great emergencies was the family habit interrupted. Thus trained, the children had no self-consciousness, and in later life the charm of their reading brought pleasure to invalids, to elderly people with waning sight, and to busy people who had little time to do their own reading.

A clever young girl in a Western city determined to make use of her ability to read well, to add something to her depleted purse. Hers was not dramatic or elocutionary reading; it was simply the reading of a cultivated woman who took pains to interpret an author's thought. She gave selected readings from current literature, choosing by preference popular authors of the day, and she had no difficulty in securing paying engagements in summer hotels, private drawing-rooms, at birthday parties of children, and under the auspices of clubs and ladies' aid societies. Her venture was profitable and the employment pleasant.

Questions and Answers

Reader, Dover, Pa. Is there any Biblical record as to how many years Lazarus lived again after he had been dead four days and resurrected?

There is no Biblical record on the duration of Lazarus' life after his miraculous restoration. There is, however, an old tradition mentioned by Epiphanius, that Lazarus lived thirty years after the miracle, and that, accompanied by Martha and Mary, he traveled to France, and preached the Gospel in Marseilles.

Herald Reader, Florence. Where is the Mount Vernon in which George Washington was born, and where he spent part of his life?

George Washington was born at Bridges Creek, Westmoreland County, Va., and not at Mount Vernon. Mount Vernon is the name of an estate in Fairfax County, Va., on the right bank of the Potomac, fifteen miles south of Washington, D. C. The estate belonged to Washington's brother Lawrence, who built there, in 1743, the mansion house. Washington inherited the estate from his brother, and made it his residence from 1759 until his death.

J. A. M., Montpelier, Ky. 1. Did Christ organize a visible church? 2. Is it right for a church and its pastor to have a contract as to the pastor's salary? 3. Is it right for a church to take public collections on the Sabbath day for missions or any other good cause?

1. He came to found a kingdom rather than a church or society. After the crucifixion, his disciples were ready to return to their ordinary occupations, but the resurrection revived their faith and the company which met in the upper room (Acts 1: 13-15) is the first church on record. The apostolic church proper began with the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2). 2. There is nothing to be said against it. The laborer is worthy of his hire. Such an arrangement, written or implied, has been the custom from early times. 3. Yes, for any cause connected with the spiritual work of the church, but not for secular objects.

M. B., Keokuk, Ia. You say the United States has pledged itself to give the Philippines an opportunity for self-government. What have we done to redeem that pledge?

It is quite evident that you have not watched the course of events there, otherwise you would have known that the first legislative assembly ever heard of in those islands was elected on July 30. This is an important step in the history of Filipino progress. It is an experiment, of course, but it is not without a parallel. We mean to do for those islands ultimately what we did for Cuba and what Great Britain is doing for the Transvaal.

Subscriber, New York. What is a widow's right in her husband's property, if there is no will and no children? It used to be one-third, but I have heard that the law has been changed and a widow gets almost nothing (widow's dowry only). Is it true or not? Will you also tell me about the personal property?

Whether the husband leaves a will or not, in New York a widow has dower in her husband's real estate, which means she is entitled to the use or net income of one-third of such real estate. If the husband dies intestate, leaving some descendant, the widow has one-third the personal property; if the husband has no descendant but leaves a parent, the widow has one-half the personal property; if there is no descendant and no parent, but husband leaves a brother, sister, etc., the widow takes one-half the personal property and all the rest, to the extent of $2,000; if no descendant, parent, brother, sister, nephew or niece, then the widow takes all.

E. A. D., West Brookfield, Mass. Why are the Chinese called "Celestials," and their country the "Heavenly Kingdom"?

China is called the "Celestial Empire" because its first emperors (real or mythological) were all heavenly deities, according to the popular belief.

Traveling Man, Wichita, Kan. Is it true (as I notice by an article in The Commoner) that the staff officers of the Salvation Army refuse to let the public know what is done with donations given them for helping the poor? Do they give a detailed report of the salaries paid?

We understand on the best of authority that the salaries of the leading staff officers of the Salvation Army are about on a level with those paid to the average mechanic or shop foreman, and a great deal less than they would receive had they put the same length of time and a similar amount of energy into secular business pursuits. The minor officers draw even

* This beautiful song was composed by Messrs. Tullar and Meredith while on a recent visit to our Children's Home just before it closed for the season. The day was rainy, with occasional glimpses of sunshine, and as the two musicians sat on the porch, they found an inspiring theme in their surroundings, and wrote the words and music of "Keep Sweet" in less than an hour. They taught it the same afternoon to the delighted children in the chapel, who learned to sing it at once. The address of the Tullar-Meredith Co. is 150 Fifth Avenue, New York.

In replying to Mr. C. H. Gibbons, Austin, Minn., in THE MAIL-BAG of September 25, reference was made to the well-known passage in Acts 26, wherein Paul relates how he persecuted the Christians before his own conversion. In his unenlightened condition, and before his conscience was quickened, he believed that he was doing rightly, as he says in verse 9. He was a Pharisee, son of a Pharisee, carefully instructed in the Scriptures and the traditions of the elders from his earliest years, and it was not surprising that his zeal for the law should have been so strong as to urge him to persecute the followers of Jesus. His service to the king did not demand such excesses; but his acts were those of the zealot, eager to serve his faith at all hazards. He may have had doubts and struggles at the time (as we gather from Romans 7), yet these did not prevent him from taking an active part in the persecutions (see Acts 26: 10, 12), and in displaying a furious zeal that seemed to suffer from no twinges of conscience whatever. His zeal is still more emphatically attested in Acts 8: 3, which tells how he "made havoc of the church," and in the opening verse of the next chapter we find him "yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples," and consulting with the high priest while in this temper, doubtless with a view to carrying out what he believed to be the Lord's work. He was commissioned by the chief priests (Acts 26: 12). That Paul himself distinguished between a bad and a good conscience he makes clear in I. Tim. 1: 19.

The Lusitania, however, is not the t vessel afloat. She enjoyed that distinction only a few days, for her sister ship, the Maure-, recently launched and now on her trial trip, is ten feet longer, and her turbine engines are horse-power, while those of the Lusitania are 68,500. First Principles of Cooking

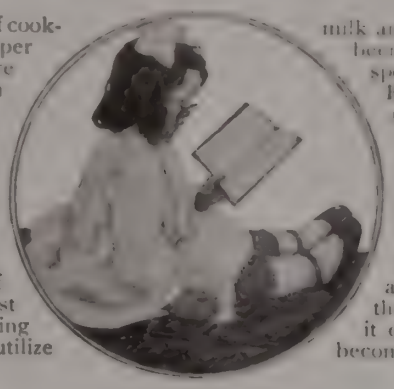
By MARY JANE McCLURE

During the honeymoon life looks luminous to the young wife. Then comes a time, though, when cold, hard-hearted Reality gives her a rap on the knuckles. Then she realizes that, after all, life is not one grand, sweet symphony of joy, and the airship of romance comes down to earth with a sudden thud and sickening thud. Love and indigestion have no affinity for each other. On the other hand, carelessly selected, inappetizing canned food and contentious are twin souls. The moral is vivid. If love is to be kept as a permanent dweller in the home the door must be barred against indigestion. So the sensible young wife begins to study the first principles of cooking.



The little housewife cons the page.
Her thirst for knowledge to assuage;
Deep secrets Grandma's specs reveal,
First principles she learns with zeal.
Her cookery is sure to please,
Taught by "My Favorite Recipes."

THE science of cookery goes deeper than the mere combination of materials that may be said to be the chemistry of cooking. Its very foundation principle lies in their selection. For instance, a housewife of experience knows that the cheaper cuts of meat really are the most nutritious, but are lacking in flavor. She will utilize these cheaper cuts of meat in the form of stews, ragouts, pot-roasts, etc., adding a little of Armour's Extract of Beef to impart the flavor which they lack. She has learned at least two of the foundation principles of cooking—economy and food values.

Another important lesson is that of quick-wittedness in combining food materials and making the best of a bad situation. Until a young wife learns this art she will be likely to have many unhappy moments.

"Lords and Masters" have a way of telephoning at the last moment that they propose to bring home an old friend to dine. This message usually partakes of the character of a peremptory command. Frequently it happens when nothing but baked beans has been prepared for the evening meal. A jar of Armour's Extract of Beef and a knowledge of how to use it make a big difference at such a crisis. The whole situation will lose its terrors—yield nothing but satisfying results.

Desiree's Potatoes. Rub a baking dish with a clove of garlic or a bit of onion (this may be omitted if the flavor is not desired). Put in the dish a layer of sliced raw potatoes, salt, pepper, a dash of flour and bits of butter. Follow with another layer of potatoes and one of seasoning. When the dish is filled, dredge thoroughly with flour and dot with bits of butter. Fill the pan with milk, or milk and cream, in which has been dissolved one teaspoonful of Armour's Extract of Beef. Bake until the potatoes are soft, which will be about forty-five minutes. A woman who has had no practical experience with Armour's Extract of Beef will be surprised and fascinated to learn the many ways in which it can be used. It has become known the world over as an especially appetizing addition to vegetable dishes, such as peas, green or wax beans, corn and other vegetables. It gives a distinctive flavor which can be secured by no other means. It solves the gravy problem, for it not only colors but gives the real beef flavor when used for this purpose.

For imparting a delicious flavor to warmed over meats it is invaluable. The reason why is easily explained. Armour's Extract of Beef is exactly the same thing you cook out of the meat in the first serving. By adding it to left-overs the original zest will be restored.

A new cook book has just been issued by Armour & Company. "My Favorite Recipes" is intended to be a cook book which will endear itself to every woman who comes across it. Besides containing a number of hints for using Armour's Extract of Beef and recipes for many dishes in which that product is not used, there are blank pages on which may be written the recipes which you prize. The miscellaneous hints and tables of proportions in it alone ought to make it of inestimable worth to women who want to do things the best way possible. Write to Armour & Company, Chicago, enclosing cap from jar of Armour's Extract of Beef, and "My Favorite Recipes" will be mailed to you.

GABRIELLE

THE FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE

By ISABELLA MACFARLANE

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Rebuffed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover. Again Captain Girard comes, and this time asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him her heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the de Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exception of Gabrielle escape to the ship. Gabrielle is secreted in a bale of linen, and sent in a cart to the seashore, where a boat is to meet her. She falls out, and the driver discovers he has had a Huguenot as a passenger. Gabrielle tries to escape, and is captured and taken to a convent. The nuns try to convert her. Late at night she wrenches the bars from her window and escapes to the shore. She finds a fisherman waiting with his boat. He rows her to the ship, and proves to be Captain Girard in disguise. He wishes to go with her, but she sends him back to his duty. He is arrested on his return and sent to the galleys. In the galleys he is placed next to Louis Marquand, and they become firm friends, not knowing they are rivals. They are transported as slaves to a West Indian island. After six months Girard receives news of his pardon. Meanwhile the Huguenots found New Rochelle in America. David Bonnefoy becomes a fur trader. A ship arrives bringing his cousin Dominique and David's son Raoul, who has brought with him his bethrothed Rosalie, and her mother, Madame Bertrand. Raoul mentions the strange disappearance of Captain Girard, and a rumor that an officer had been sent to the galleys. Gabrielle knows that the officer and Captain Girard must be the same person.

"OH, yes, Captain Girard did know Gabrielle," spoke up Rosalie. "He saw her in the courtyard that day, and followed her to our place, and made love to her, and asked her to marry him; but how he came to aid her, I don't know."

"He found out," said Gabrielle, "that the fisherman whom you, father, had employed, was going to deliver me into the hands of the coast patrol. He bought the man off, and it was he, not the fisherman, who rowed me to the vessel, And oh! it grieves my heart to think he must suffer such a terrible punishment for that act of kindness."

"Why did you never speak of this before?" said her father.

"I could not, father. The secret was his, not mine. I could not respond to the wild, impetuous love he professed for me, but I learned to respect it, and to make it a subject of conversation would have seemed to me an indelicacy."

That Gabrielle had often thought of Francis Girard during those passing years goes without saying what woman would not appreciate the chivalrous devotion he had shown towards her? -and now there was added to her appreciation a tender pity, not unmixed with self-reproach.

CHAPTER XXI

A Pilgrimage

ALTHOUGH it was true, as David informed his cousin Dominique, that as yet they had no church or pastor, they were not on that account obliged to do without the ministrations of religion. There was a large and flourishing French church in New York, the doors of which were ever open to them. True, it was situated at a distance from them of eighteen miles, but to those devoted religionists who had left their country for conscience' sake, and who previous to that had been obliged to worship amid the ruins of their demolished churches, or in caves and waste places, that seemed but a trifling matter, so grateful were they for the privilege.

They could not, of course, attend every Sunday, but on special occasions, such as the quarterly communion season of the French Church, the whole community were wont to repair thither en masse.

Gathering all the children into one place, and giving them in charge to one or two competent and trustworthy persons, every able-bodied inhabitant, both male and female, set out at day-break on the Sunday morning, and walked the eighteen miles—returning the same evening, and by the same conveyance. They walked bare-footed, carrying their shoes and stockings, which they put on when approaching their destination. This was not done with any idea of penance, but with the thrifty thought of saving shoe-leather.

One of these quarterly pilgrimages occurring soon after the advent of the newcomers, it was arranged that Cousin Dominique should then make his confession, and be restored to the bosom of the Reformed Church.

It was also proposed that Raoul and Rosalie should be married at the same time. David had demurred a little at this match, on account of kindred blood, but as the cousinship was one several times removed, the objections were finally withdrawn and the wedding decided on.

It was a beautiful morning in spring, the air sweet and balmy, the soft, gray light of dawn just appearing in the eastern sky, while the stars still sparkled overhead, when the "pilgrims," who had assembled at David de Bonnefoy's house, started on their long tramp.

Each one, in addition to his shoes and stockings, carried a lunch, which he was to eat by the wayside, washing it down with a draught of water from some spring or brook that he chanced to come across—for as yet there were no hotels or wayside taverns where they could be entertained.

Cousin Dominique, though anxious for his restoration, did not relish the long pilgrimage that preceded it. He was fond of his ease, and being a heavy man, it was perhaps worse for him than for one of lighter build.

"Oh," said he to David, when they had gone the first ten miles of the journey, "how I wish I had the good horse that those villains of soldiers took from me on the road to Paris!"

"I have a horse. I need one in my business. But I never use it on these occasions. I should be ashamed to ride on horseback when so many women and girls are trudging on foot. I have tried to persuade Gabrielle to ride the horse, for I do not like to see her soft, white feet treading the dust and pebbles. But she will not. She bravely trudges on with the rest."

The road, after leaving the one long, winding street of the village, led chiefly along the shore of the Sound, whose glistening waters leaped and danced in the sunshine, while the many charming islets that dotted its surface showed a luxuriant vegetation, for the most part undisturbed by the foot of man.

Gabrielle and Rosalie walked together, Raoul being always close at hand to help them over bad places, muddy spots, and so forth, for the road was merely a country road, and by no means kept in good order.

Gabrielle was very fond of her little cousin, and at this interesting epoch in her life had taken her under her especial care.

Under the circumstances, there was little opportunity for the display of wedding finery; but, thanks to Gabrielle's taste and the girl's own simple loveliness, the general opinion was that a sweeter bride had never stood before that altar.

A Successful Hemstitching Attachment for Family Sewing Machines—The

KRAG HEMSTITCHER

This is not an experiment or a device that will work only "now and then." It is a thoroughly, practical hemstitching attachment for family sewing machines, which enables any woman to produce perfect hemstitching with almost the ease and rapidity of plain sewing. The work is more satisfactory than hand-hemstitching and is done in a fraction of the time. The work is done on one piece of folded material, then cut apart. Think what it means to have real hemstitched personal and household linen; think how it will help you with the children's dresses!

Sent postpaid on receipt of price, $2.50 (In ordering, state style and make of your machine.)

The Krag Hemstitcher is extremely simple in construction and operation, and it cannot get out of order. Simply attach it to your sewing machine and go ahead. We positively guarantee it to work to your entire satisfaction or we will refund the price you pay for it. Give name and style of your sewing machine and

BECOME A +++ NURSE

Woman's most congenial and lucrative profession

BY our ideal method of training at home, we have enabled thousands of women to earn $10 to $25 per week. If you desire to become a nurse, or if you are a practical nurse and do not know of the remarkable work carried on by this school, you owe it to yourself to learn all we can tell you of the method by which we have opened a new sphere of opportunity to hosts of women through our training. A graduate writes:

"I have found the course very practical and helpful. I have acquired confidence in myself, for I have been taught how to nurse to the satisfaction of physicians and patients. I receive $3.00 a day and am busy all the time. All I am, as a nurse, the school has made me."

We know of no school that has so ssful a plan by which the pupil's interest is lated and maintained. Our success is n by the fact that we have graduated more s in the past twelve months than in the four previous. We seek the enrollment of no nt whom we cannot benefit.

GABRIELLE

Cousin Dominique made his confession, and was duly received, and in proof of his sincerity made a handsome donation to the church.

The services over and these two important events disposed of, the pilgrims spent an hour or two, while resting, in pleasant intercourse with their compatriots of New York, after which the procession started on its homeward journey, reaching New Rochelle about midnight, all very tired in body, but wonderfully refreshed and strengthened in spirit.

The wedding feast, about which Raoul was so concerned, was held shortly after, and never did Gabrielle and Christine do themselves more honor than in its preparation.

David purchased for his son one of the fifty-acre farms into which the land had now been surveyed and subdivided, and there, in a neat cottage, with his wife and her mother, dwelt the ex-burgher-guard, a soldier no more, but a tiller of the soil.

CHAPTER XXII

NOBLESSE OBLIGE

WE left Captain Girard in the act of leaving his chamber for the dining-room of M. Gromartin, under the guidance of a neat negro girl.

Here he was presented to Madame Gromartin, a charming Creole lady, whom the planter, himself a native of France, had married soon after settling on the island.

The supper was simple, consisting chiefly of fruits, with cakes of cassava bread, rice stewed in cocoanut milk, and other tropical dishes, which to Francis, so long accustomed to the coarsest of foods, seemed like the nectar and ambrosia of the gods.

He found M. and Madame Gromartin very affable and courteous, the peculiar circumstances of the case adding a touch of romance to their acquaintance, which the handsome and agreeable personality of the young soldier tended to enhance.

When supper was over, they passed to the cool veranda, whence, after some desultory conversation, the host withdrew to his private office, to receive the daily reports of his steward and overseer, leaving his wife to entertain their guest.

Madame Gromartin was burning with curiosity to know the details of a history that had transformed an officer of the French army into an engagé on a West Indian plantation, and by a series of adroit yet perfectly well-mannered questions she obtained what she desired. For so sympathetic were her voice and manner, and so sincere her interest in him, that the young man's heart, so long shut in on itself, at once opened to her.

"I was born," said he, "in the Château of Belvoisin, which had belonged to my mother's family for centuries. My father died when I was quite young, but I was trained in the practice of arms, as every French gentleman of our times is bound to be. When I reached manhood, I was appointed a captain in the King's Dragoons, through the influence of my mother, who had been in her widowhood lady of honor to the late queen."

"And what, may I ask, was the 'youthful indiscretion' alluded to in the wording of your pardon?"

Girard flushed up, and then turned pale. "Ah! madame, you touch a tender spot in my heart. In the exercise of my military duties, I was sent to La Rochelle to assist in instituting a dragonnade—that terrible engine of persecution which our king, incited by a wicked woman and a fanatical priest, had seen fit to use against his subjects of the Reformed or Huguenot faith." (In spite of all he had suffered he was still loyal to his king!) "In placing some soldiers in the house of a wealthy merchant, I saw a beautiful girl—his daughter. I loved her. I sought her love. She repulsed me. She

There is no doubt about the OSTERMOOR

The Ostermoor Mattress has been proved by every test that human reason demands. The theory behind it is right—that the best mattress must be built, not stuffed—free from animal hair or anything else unclean and unsanitary.

It has stood the test of time—for over 50 years we have been making Ostermoor mattresses to satisfy a constantly increasing demand.

It has a multitude of witnessess to its excellences. Many thousands have of their own accord sent us letters of gratitude and congratulation over this mattress that induces sleep and ministers to health. The name Ostermoor is to-day a household word, due not alone to our convincing advertisements, but to the good report of it that neighbor has made to neighbor.

It has been measured by the Inch that rules the business world. Nothing of inferior quality can be sold to the public year after year in increasing quantity. Imitations of the Ostermoor by the score have come and gone. Imitations are now in the field. They too will live only as they have real worth. Their borrowed glory can last but a little day. told me she loved another. In the fury of my passion, I wanted to slay that other. She told me I could not reach him, for he was a galley slave, but that she loved him all the more on that account, for his punishment had followed an act, the noblest that one man can do for another. He had given himself up to that horrible fate to save an old man, his father, who had incurred the penalty."

"That was indeed noble."

"Her opposition seemed only to increase my love, and in my madness and infatuation, I resolved to give up everything for her, and accompany her and her family to America (whither they were bound) in the hope that I might ultimately win her. Ah! it was then that I learned her true worth, as in a few trenchant words she set before me the difference between passion and duty, between honor and dishonor. In obedience to her words I renounced her, though in the act of renunciation I loved her more than ever. I rowed her myself to the ship that was to carry her away. On my return to the shore I was arrested for assisting a Huguenot to escape."

"Oh, how sad! How unfortunate!"

"But the strangest part of the story is to come, dear lady. By some queer turn of fate or fortune, I was assigned to the same galley and chained to the same rowing-bench as the other lover."

"That was indeed strange."

"Three years we toiled together—I, sullen, gloomy, despondent, cursing my fate—he, calm, resigned, trusting in God, cheerful, hopeful, and showing numberless kindnesses to me, of which I confess I was not worthy. We did not know each other. We did not dream we were rivals, until on our way to this island. Did he turn against me then? No. He said, 'Let us drop all thoughts of rivalry, and bend every energy to the thought of escape'—of escape for both, you understand. He never thought of escape for himself alone, leaving me behind. Well, now my pardon has come. I am free, but he is still a slave."

"He will miss you very much when you are gone."

"No, Madame Gromartin—pardon me—he will not miss me; for I shall not leave the island until he can accompany me."

"But that is impossible. Were he a private slave you might purchase his freedom. But he is a government engagé. There is no release for him, unless he could procure a pardon, like yourself."

"Yes, he may escape."

He rose from his seat, and paced the veranda for a few moments as if pondering. Then he sat down again.

"Dear madame," he said, "as I have, so to speak, constituted you my confessor, there is something more I should like to confide to you. May I?"

"Certainly, sir. I shall be pleased to hear it, and shall not betray your confidence. And if I can help you in any way, command me."

"Since I entered your house, Madame Gromartin, I have passed through a terrible conflict. Not any scene of war or battle could compare with it. It was a conflict with myself. It was a fight with a terrible temptation."

He then detailed to her, in voluble and impassioned language, the agonies of mind through which he had passed in the afternoon—a narration that more than once drew tears from the eyes of the kind lady. He did not spare himself. He enlarged on the baseness of which he had almost been guilty. "But by the grace of God," said he, in conclusion, "I won the victory! I conquered myself! And now, when I leave St. Christopher, Louis shall also go!"

"But how? What plan have you for his deliverance?"

Francis hesitated.

"Perhaps I ought not to tell you, lest M. Gromartin should think it his duty to hinder it. But you have been so kind and sympathetic, I feel that I may trust you. It is a very simple plan—one that has been practised by refugees."

Eternal Life*

MERE continuous existence would be a burden to us. The legend of the Wandering Jew is a conception wretched beyond thought. The utter weariness of it, the labor and the pain of our present lives extended year after year with no relief, long after the capacity to enjoy life has departed, is absolute misery. When we speak of eternal life, we mean something very different from the life we now enjoy. This ages, grows feeble and loses its charm. It is the renewal of life, the inexhaustible vitality of perpetual youth, that we crave. This it is which we obtain through Christ.

It is obvious that it cannot be associated with the body. That develops up to maturity and then decays. But there are men whose spirit is clear and bright, active and vigorous in old age, and even in death is full of hope. It is easy to conceive of such spirits living on, clothed with that spiritual body of which Paul speaks as being the gift of God. Free from the infirmities of this life, renewed by God's power, the spirit can live on with new joys and pleasures indefinitely. The tabernacle perishes, but there is a building of God for which we may hope, that is eternal. It is evident even to the most superficial thinker, that it is the mysterious inmate of the body, the entity which speaks of "my body," which is not the "me," but only the habitation of it, that will live on.

It is strange that with this conviction we devote so much thought to the body, providing for its enjoyments, considering its claims and decorating and adorning it. Strange too, that we devote our energies to the acquisition of money which, like the body, we must leave behind, and neglecting to develop the spirit which will survive it. To say the least, our lives are illogical if we really believe in eternity. The best of us live as if we were to stay here permanently, and give but little thought to the life beyond the grave. As the apostle said, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," but we have so many hints in the world around us, and in our own natures, not to speak of the direct teachings of the Bible, that we might give more thought to that mysterious future when the material shall have passed away and the spiritual alone remains.

The Sight-Singing Classes

MANY inquiries continue to reach us concerning the Sight-Singing Classes of Madame Newman, which open a few weeks hence. Applicants for membership in these classes are now being enrolled in series, according to their order, as fast as they are received. All applicants should send full name and address to Musical Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Every application is submitted to Madame Newman, who will communicate with the intending student.

The great success of these Sight-Singing Classes last year showed that they were appreciated by readers of all ages. They afforded an opportunity, at a merely nominal cost, of learning to read and sing music correctly by the simplest and best system, under the personal supervision of a teacher of recognized ability, who has successfully conducted the largest singing classes ever taught by any woman in any part of the world. Hundreds of grateful pupils have written to her without solicitation, expressing satisfaction at having been trained by a teacher so thorough and so accomplished.

These courses are conducted by mail exclusively. Written instruction is given added value from the fact that it can be referred to at any time, so that many points are permanently fixed which might otherwise be lost. The pupil need not be endowed with a "special gift" in order to read music. Any one of average intelligence can do so, if he or she starts with the fundamental principles and builds upwards. The student is not only taught how to read music "at sight," but also how each note should sound. The ear as well as the eye is trained. Even to advanced musicians the course will be found exceedingly useful. To the beginner it is comprehensive and self-explanatory and lends a greater interest to every song and hymn through an intelligent understanding of the music itself.

Dr. Henry van Dyke's First Visit to the Holy Land

With tents, horses and mules, and a camera, the author of "Little Rivers" went, last March, to see the Holy Land for the first time. But he saw the Holy Land as few have ever seen it. He never slept under a roof during all his stay of weeks in Palestine. He camped in groves of olive trees: he swam in the Sea of Galilee and fished on the shores of Capernaum and in springs of the Jordan. And from this standpoint, fragrant with the breath of flowers and fruit trees and of mountain top and valley, Dr. van Dyke fills every line with that freshness of enthusiasm that comes to a man when he sees, for the first time, what he has desired all his life to see. With his own pictures, his delightful papers, "Out-of-Doors in the Holy Land," begin in the October issue of The Ladies' Home Journal.

Union with Christ*

FAITH is a great mystery to the worldly-minded man. He is told that by believing in Jesus his life will be transformed, his character changed, and he will become a new man. The man cannot see how this can be. He has many beliefs, personal, social, and political, that have but little influence on his daily life, and he cannot understand how the belief in Christ can affect him to so great an extent. It is only as he is led to see in Christ the source and fount of spiritual life that he comes to understand the full meaning of faith. This kind of faith brings a man into union with Christ, and that union, the more fully it is enjoyed, increases in power and influence. It comes so close that it fulfils Christ's conception, "I am the vine and ye are the branches."

Membership in Christ's kingdom involves this close union. We speak of a man as being a member of the Methodist or Presbyterian or Baptist church, and that is legitimate. He is joined to that body of Christians, being agreed with them in doctrine, and so makes public confession of Christ; but this does not always involve membership in Christ's kingdom. His creed may be entirely orthodox and his conduct irreproachable and yet he may be outside the kingdom. There may be many reasons for outward conformity and for a blameless life, but it is only the man who is united to Christ by a living faith who is really a member of his kingdom. His words are very solemn and explicit: "If a man abide not in me he is cast forth as a branch and is withered." How many such withered branches we see! Lives that are labeled Christian, but destitute of Christ's life and power.

What then is this abiding in him, that he deemed so essential to membership in his kingdom? It is the dependence on him for life and power, the saturation of the soul with his principles, the closeness of association with him that brings his spirit into intimate relations, so that men see in us Jesus actually living and his power controlling and inspiring us. It is this which separates his people from the world and renders them his instruments for service.

* Topic of the Epworth League for October 13. "Membership in the Church." John 15: 1-8; Rom. 12: 4, 5; I. Cor. 12: 12-28; Rev. 21: 27.

The Cripple's Garden

IN the Chicago Home for Incurables there is a remarkable patient. Both his legs are gone, having been cut off above the knee; several fingers on each hand are absent, the result of accident or amputation; and even the poor body has not escaped, for some of the ribs have been crushed or broken. Yet, with all of these physical drawbacks, this poor cripple is one of the most cheerful souls imaginable. In a recent letter written to a friend in Yonkers, N. Y., the cripple writes:

Did you ever hear of the garden I have and the flowers I raise? Well, through the centre runs a path with flowers on either side: a large bed of Patience and a beautiful bed of Hope, a fine Climbing Courage, and a little vine called Cheerfulness that runs in and out all over my garden. Around the garden is a fence made of Determinations, with posts of Perseverance; this is to keep out the Grumbler Vine that grows all about outside and tries to get in. Outside the garden is a tree like a Weeping Willow, which sometimes casts a shadow over my flowers, and once in a while a blackbird comes and sings in its branches. I call it the Complaining Bird. It does not come often. In one corner of my garden I have a hot-bed where I raise Smiles, because they have to be forced.

What do you think of my flower garden?

Surely, the optimism of this brave soul under affliction, should carry a lesson to the grumblers.

"The Empress of Solitude"

The ex-Empress Eugenie, whom they call the "Empress of Solitude," is now living in the Hotel Continental in Paris, quite near the spot of her once regal home where she shared with Napoleon III the idolatry of the French and the praises of the world. She drives about Paris in a brougham with a single horse in place of the former $20,000 coach and eight spanking nags. During the heat of summer she inhabits a modest villa on the shores of the Mediterranean, where the curious traveler may often see her, dressed in sad-colored clothing, leaning on an ebony stick, and watching the mutable sea.

A Unknown Path

By Mrs. M. Baxter

T children of Israel, the people of he Lord, were about to enter upon the st momentous crisis in their history Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, very any of their descendants, and still mor the fathers of the present generation ho had died in the wilderness, had all ged for the fulfilment of God's pro e—to see, enter, and possess the lan f promise. The people were now on very border. Joshua had risen ear in the morning, and, following God direction, was ready to his hand for rvice. He and the people had left Shi n, and were now on the very banks of River Jordan, looking wistfully ove the other side: to the land which flow "with milk and honey." An apparently insuperable barrier lay between, but one was occupied with it, for God wa ith them, and they knew it.

er three days, the officers went thr gh the host, and "they commanded the eople, saying, When ye see the ark of e covenant of the Lord your God, and he priests the Levites bearing it, the ye shall remove from your place, and go after it. Yet there shall be a spa between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure; come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go: for ye have not passed this way heretofore." To the teachable child of God who stands in his true position of grace,—a saved, cleansed, delivered, anointed man,—no question is of more intense moment than that of guidance. His own will quite laid down, he was s to be completely and in all points as red about the will of God.

ow often have we sought for guidance so plain and palpable that it would give us no trouble to recognize it, and which would be no exercise either to our attention or our faith! Anything which we see before us we can follow mechanically; but the Lord in his leading seeks to absorb all our spiritual faculties in tr ing the way which he takes. We le n more of God, and have, so to speak, a tter view of him when we are exercised about his guidance than we should h e if he dealt with us as mere machines. "He made known his ways unto Mo es" (Psa. 103: 7).

Come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go." human reason would have said, "Follow us close, so that you may not mistake your way." But this is not always how God leads his people. Sometimes God gives us a direction which is in the main to guide our whole life, as in the case of Paul of Tarsus when the Holy Ghost separated him to the life of a foreign missionary (Acts 13: 1-4). He knew he had to keep steadily on at this work; but he was by no means thereby rendered independent. Still, for all the details, as to what countries and what cities he was to go to, he sought and received separate guidance. A divine way and a carnal way, the way of God and the way of man, both lie before us whenever and wherever a new start on our journey begins. God's way is not that of blind superstition, but of intelligent cooperation with him, after waiting upon him and learning his way at his feet.

Every child of God is from time to time brought in his experience into a position in which a decision must be made which may change the whole current of his life. It may be a call to yield himself to missionary labor, and he must then face death to all plans for earthly comfort, distinction, etc., and be content to live solitary and very much unknown on earth. But for what? To God's instrument and fellow-worker, making known his great truth among the heathen; to come down to the lowest and most degraded of human kind; to carry not the thoughts of God's heart of love, and thus to fit into the very place to which his infinite love has called him. Where the will is not wholly given up, and the body is not fully presented to God in living sacrifice, the conflict is sometimes terrible; but where the will is yielded, where the question is only, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" the only fear is lest a mistake should be made about his direction.

BECKMANN PIANOS ON CREDIT

Your choice of quarter-sawed oak, figured mahogony or figured walnut woods.

We will Ship a Beckmann Piano to Your Home on FREE TRIAL no matter where you live. A world-famous piano in every home on easy monthly payments without the dealer's profits.

Don't make a move in piano buying until you have read and analyzed this great offer and received a copy of our handsome free piano catalogue.

The excessive profits paid to piano dealers are an unjust taxation on the buying public and we have formulated a plan of selling the celebrated BECKMANN pianos at such a low price and on such easy terms that the piano situation in this country will be relieved and simplified to a vast degree. The beautiful tone qualities of the BECKMANN have of course given it unrivalled standing in musical circles everywhere and in order to demonstrate and convince you of the vast superiority of the celebrated BECKMANN, we will ship you one of these pianos on free trial.

THE PRICE OF THE BECKMANN HERE ILLUSTRATED IS $175.00 and the terms $15.00 cash with the order and $8.00 monthly. Our price of $175.00 bears no middleman's profit and the piano comes to you at the exact cost of manufacture with but our one small percentage of profit added. The piano here illustrated and which we offer for $175.00 would cost you $275.00 or more if sold to you by any dealer in America and we absolutely guarantee to save you at least $100.00 on this piano. To convince you of this fact we will ship the instrument to you on receipt of the required first payment of $15.00 and if you do not find it by all odds the most beautiful and richest appearing piano you have ever heard or seen, or if after using it for 30 days you are for any reason dissatisfied, simply ship it back to us at our expense and we will refund your first payment of $15.00, together with all transportation charges which you have paid. This will end the transaction without the cost of a penny to you. If on the other hand after using it for 30 full days and comparing it with any other pianos which may be offered to you, you like it and our claims have been justified in every detail, if it is all and more than we have led you to believe and expect, if it charms you in tone, appearance, finish, workmanship and durability, if it satisfies you more than any piano at twice its price, then keep it and send us the sum of $8.00 per month until you have paid the total of $175.00.

SEND FOR OUR FREE PIANO CATALOGUE TODAY. Our latest piano catalogue illustrates three other styles of BECKMANN pianos as well as our IVERHOFF piano which sells for $145.00. If the style of the piano here illustrated is not exactly what you desire, or if you wish to learn more about the BECKMANN pianos, be sure and write for this free catalogue today. NEW INVENTION. CLEANS CLOTHES WHILE YOU REST.

NO WASH BOARDS, WASHING MACHINES OR CHEMICALS. NO WASH DAY. NOTHING LIKE IT. NOT SOLD IN STORES.

SEE HOW SIMPLE, different, easy. Put on stove—add water, then soap, then clothes—that's all. In 5 to 8 minutes, clothes clean. Laundries clean clothes without rubbing—EASY WAY does same at your home. You can rest or read between batches. Dirt removed automatically except to move knob occasionally. Clothes cleaned while you get breakfast. With wash board you rub, then boil 20 to 30 minutes, then rub again. Or you boil, then tire yourself running heavy machine, which wears, tears and rubs the clothes—and afterward rub by hand anyway. The EASY WAY does alone in one operation the combined work of wash boiler, wash board and washing machine—less time, almost no labor—no injury to clothes.

EASY WAY creates energy by mechanical manipulation associated with hot water, soap suds, heated steam, and scalding vapor, utilized as a compound force, all contained in a closed compartment. Special operating arrangements.

Cleans woolens, flannels, blankets, colored clothes, as well as white goods, finest laces, curtains, bed clothes. Saves your time, fuel, labor, clothes, buttons. Saves your strength, looks, health, money.

WITH EASY WAY, 30, 40, 50 minutes cleans washing which before took entire day.

No rubbing, wear, tear or injury. No soggy, bad smelling, heavy wood,—but all metal, sanitary, light in weight. Easily used, cleaned, handled—always ready. Child can use it—no experiment.

USED BY THOUSANDS WHO PRAISE IT.

A. O. Leonard INVENTOR LEONARD'S ANTISEPTIC EAR DRUM

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of thousands of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. The megaphone principle and the flat sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. WORKING THROUGH COLLEGE the faculties of a number of leading colleges for women.

From Smith College came this answer from the president's office: "Some of our girls have tried co-operative house-keeping, some wait on table in houses in the city in return for their board; some assist in the library and scientific laboratories; some tutor, sew, mend, clean silver, copy notes, and do various services for their fellow students. One student earned $300 sewing and developing photographs in one year."

At this same college for women at Northampton, Mass., was graduated in 1905 a young woman who made the most notable record known in the world of women's colleges, in respect to working her way. She came from Princeton, N.J. To obtain money to meet her college expenses she did every kind of work possible, thus exemplifying the democratic spirit at Smith. And despite all her hard outside work, she found time to act as president of her class, being elected to that position by two hundred students. She made a business of keeping the rooms of students clean; she mended clothes for her wealthy classmates; she waited upon table, and performed other kinds of housework. And all the students at Smith helped this young woman, for four years, to help herself.

At another college a girl displayed in her room a stock of all the articles necessary for cleaning and polishing women's shoes, and thus from the sale of these paid her living expenses through her freshman year. At Barnard College a number of girls earn two dollars an hour giving piano lessons or tutoring. Others at this college act as agents for firms that manufacture caps and gowns, and other small but necessary articles of woman's attire, selling these goods on commission and thus saving students the trouble of going down town to shop. Again, at this same college, students of artistic trend make as much as one hundred dollars during a college term in painting posters and calendars. Others earn money playing the piano for the gymnasium class.

At women's colleges, as in men's, there is plenty of work awaiting the typewriter and stenographer, the copyist, the assistant instructor, and the nurse. Among the occupations which women students have added to the regular list is that of photography. Many students at Barnard, Cornell, and other colleges sell the products of their own cameras, either in the form of groups of snapshots made on the college grounds, or books of photographs of college life. Many girls are able to pay their college expenses by newspaper reporting, though this work now requires trained ability, and hence, while it is the highest paid, is open only to young women of unusual talent.

Then there is the harvest-time of the vacation months, as in the case of men students. How often has the reader arrived at a hotel in a mountain or sea resort, especially in New England, to find himself waited upon at table by a quiet, refined young woman, evidently one of superior education. Upon inquiry, you have found your waitress to be a college student, who is earning money thus to pay her tuition fees during the coming winter.

The faculty of Barnard College report that twenty-seven girls from that institution worked last summer as clerks, stenographers, private secretaries, traveling companions and governesses, and earned an average of $117 for the two months of July and August.

Quite a number of college girls, especially from Barnard, the Woman's College at Baltimore and Mount Holyoke College, are employed during the summer as traveling companions or private secretaries to people of wealth. Those who wish to employ college women in such positions are willing to pay liberally for the services rendered, knowing that by application to the colleges they will secure some one competent and trustworthy. Some girls thus employed have earned as much as $100 a month. One Barnard girl was paid $100 a month during the summer vacation for acting as governess to two children.

College professors say that those students who have struggled for their education are apt to make a wise use of it. By being obliged to seize upon every point of vantage in earning necessary money, the student qualifies himself or herself for success in life. Above all else, the pursuit of knowledge thus in the face of the obstacle of the empty purse, teaches one early to be master or mistress of adverse circumstances. GILSON WILLETS.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST F. M. ROSS, formerly of Elmira, N.Y., is now pastor of the Reformed Church at Grahamsville, N. Y.

—THOMAS HOUSTON, the "Blind Evangelist," has just concluded two weeks' tent services in Elkland, Pa. There were many professed conversions, notably two men over seventy years of age.

—ON OCTOBER 2 and 3 the Moravian College and Theological Seminary at Bethlehem, Pa., celebrates its centennial. There are only two theological schools in the United States that are older.

—MRS. J. B. ROBERTSON, missionary at Jack Town, Liberia, W. A., writes that many of the heathen there are changing to Christianity. These converts are cruelly persecuted by their heathen relations.

—MISSIONARY J. E. SHOEMAKER, Yu-yiao, China, writes that a committee of missionary ladies in Ningpo has begun a rescue work for Chinese girls, "hundreds of whom are now sold to lives of shame and misery every year."

MISSIONARY NELLIE M. BRYANT, of the Indian Christian Realm Mission, writes of a visit to the Ellore villages on the east coast. There has been a wonderful revival in that section of India and hundreds have been converted and baptized.

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANS, of Fairbury, Ill., who during last year's evangelistic work held several union Methodist tabernacle revivals in different cities and witnessed over 7,000 seekers, will begin a union Methodist revival with the twenty-two Methodist churches in the city of Seattle, Wash., September 22. The pastors have built a large tabernacle for these meetings.

—EVANGELIST WILLIAM A. SUNDAY, known as the "Baseball Evangelist," is a speaker whose addresses are full of pith and epigram. One of his latest illustrations is this: "You will run all the way down town from your home to renew your fire insurance if you have let it lapse for a day. But you have waited twenty, thirty, forty, fifty years taking out insurance on your immortal soul."

Russia's Armor-Clad Police

In Yalut Orovsky "Government," Omutinsky parish, the police have just seized an alleged "dangerous" person, Semen Pankin, whose age, attested by official records, is 121 years. Semen is now in Tumensky jail. Another police triumph was the capture at Peterhof of a blind man, charged with trying to corrupt the army because he gave a soldier a revolutionary leaflet. So many police have recently been killed in Riga that, by direction of the governor, the Riga "bobby" now walks his beat clad in armor, sufficiently thick to withstand the bullet of a Browning pistol, the regulation weapon of the revolutionist.

SPECIAL ATTRACTIONS

In the Fall and Winter numbers of The Housewife we shall present many new and attractive features, in carrying further our plans for its betterment and to more firmly cement the attachment which thousands of readers have expressed towards this publication. We shall commence in October a serial story of unusual interest, entitled:

The Romance of Hans Hogan

By Owen Kildare

Author of "My Mamie Rose," "The Good of the Wicked," etc., etc.

In this story the author, with his usual skill, tells of the lives and loves of the plain people who dwell by the thousands in the great "East Side" of New York. We also mention a few writers whose work will shortly appear in our columns:

Miss Lillian Bell
Author of "Abroad with the Jimmies," "A Little Sister to the Wilderness," etc., etc.

J. L. Harbour
For many years Assistant Editor of Youth's Companion.

Mrs. Alice McAllilly
Author of "The Larkins' Wedding," etc., etc.

Hilda Richmond
An ever welcome favorite.

Augusta Larned
Author of "The Mrs. Sweetser Sketches," etc., etc.

Edna Edwards Wylie
Author of "The Ward of the Sewing Circle," "Theodore's Stepmother," etc., etc.

Mary Madeline Wood
Formerly Department Editor Ladies' World, New York.

Amelia E. Barr
Author of "The Bow of Orange Ribbon," "Jan Vedder's Wife," etc., etc.

Nora Archibald Smith
A most delightful writer of Children's Stories and Verses.

Eleanor H. Porter
A faithful delineator of the best New England character.

Questions and Answers

R. L. P., Bowling Green, Va. Are there any States in which women vote on every issue, including the vote for President?

Women vote on equal terms with men in four States. Established in Wyoming in 1869; in Colorado, in 1893; in Utah, in 1896; and in Idaho, in 1896. In Kansas women vote on school and municipal questions, and in eighteen other States they have school suffrage. Montana and Iowa permit them to vote on municipal bond issues, and in 1898 Louisiana allowed women taxpayers a vote on all questions submitted to taxpayers. A woman taxpayer in New York can vote on a proposition to raise money by taxation.

E. S. H., Bellefontaine, Miss. 1. What is meant by the new cloth on the old garment in Mark 2: 21? 2. Are the Ten Commandments binding on Christians now?

1. The new cloth is really the unshrunken cloth which, when it became wet and dried, would draw and tear the old garment, making a greater rent. The meaning was that at that time the most intelligent Jews, such as Nicodemus, were hailing Christ as a reformer. They were mistaken. His religion was not a patch on the old. The old could not be mended, but must give place to his new religion. A specimen of this futile attempt was seen in the struggle to force the old Jewish laws on the Gentiles, which was repudiated (see Acts 15: 1-21). 2. Why do you ask? Is there any one of them any Christian would wish to violate? The Christian is not under law, but his obligations are stronger than law.

E. F. G., Fairfax, Ga. 1. We often hear the expression, "Not according to Hoyle." Who was Hoyle, where did he live and when, and what did he do? 2. Is it safe for an individual to proceed with applications for government patents, or better to employ an attorney?

1. Edmund Hoyle was a native of London, who died in 1769, aged ninety-seven. He was a celebrated authority on whist and wrote a treatise on the subject. 2. You will save time, worry and possible expense by having an attorney.

N. R. R., Milford, Tex. How did Moses and Aaron come together when they went to bring the children of Israel out of Egypt?

They were brothers, Aaron being the eldest son of the Levite Amram. (See Exodus 6: 20). Aaron was divinely directed to go into the wilderness to meet his long-exiled brother Moses. (Exodus 4: 27). On reaching Goshen, the two seem to have come to a mutual understanding, and thereafter Aaron assisted Moses in carrying out his great commission. (See Exodus 4: 28 to 31).

M. McL., Bennettsville, S. C. Why does a dog turn around several times before lying down?

Naturalists assure us that the habit you mention is an inherited one and dates back to the days when all dogs were wild and wolfish, and when their sleeping places were in the bush or jungle, which they chose for security. They moved around in a circle to smooth down the tall grass before lying down.

Reader, Wilmington, Del. As to reading the Bible through, when you say three chapters a day, do you mean two in the Old Testament and one in the New?

The writer of the suggestion in question meant that his plan was to read two chapters in the Old Testament mornings, and one in the New Testament evenings, with two additional Psalms every Sunday throughout the year, in order to complete the whole Bible in a twelvemonth.

In an article concerning the Moravian Church and its progress in America, which appeared in our issue of September 25, it should have been explained that the Church magazine, the Moravian, is a weekly publication. It is published at Bethlehem, Pa., by Mr. H. T. Frueauff, the subscription price being $1.50 a year.

E. K., Kalioka, Mo. Is there any authority for the formula uttered at baptism?

If you refer to Matt. 28: 19, you will find that the formula has the best authority and was not designed by man. Jesus, before his ascension, directed that the baptism should be "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

C. N. M., Austin, Tex. Please explain how an author can sell an article to a magazine and afterwards have it published in book form by another publishing house. When he sells the article to the magazine does he reserve the right to have it published in book form?

He either sells the serial or magazine rights and reserves the book rights, or he sells outright to the magazine and secures its permission afterward to use it in book form.

Mission Sled Contributed by "Christian Herald" Readers for the Nain Mission, Labrador

SOME time ago we published a letter from the Rev. Christian Schmitt of the Moravian Mission at Nain, Labrador, in which the missionary told of the loss of his only traveling sled through an accident on the ice. Our readers were invited to help him, and contributions came in which have enabled us to procure a new sled for the mission. The sled is built of hickory, bound with stout leather thongs, and is long and strong and capable of withstanding a heavy strain. It was built in New York City, under the supervision of Mr. R. D. Wolterbeek, a friend of the mission, and is now on its way to the Arctic. The sled is similar to those used by Dr. W. Grenfell of the Labrador Mission.

M. F. G., Rome, Ga. 1. What was the difference between the Pilgrims and the Puritans? I read that they were not the same people; that one set came directly to Plymouth and the other set went to Holland and then came to America. 2. In the Crown Encyclopedia, it is stated that the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock December 21, 1620, yet I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that a monument has been erected at Provincetown, Mass., to commemorate the fact that they first landed there. Please explain.

1. It was the Pilgrims who went to Holland and then came to America. A certain number of people who lived in the vicinity of Scrooby, England, wished to worship God in their own way, and removed to Holland; there they were joined by others of their way of thinking, who had also fled from England. After a few years they decided to go to America, as some of the younger people were forsaking the ways of their fathers for those of the Dutch. The Puritan colonies in Massachusetts seemed merged into one. 2. The monument at Provincetown commemorates the fact that the Mayflower first anchored in the harbor and a small party was sent ashore to investigate the country. They came back and the Mayflower proceeded to Plymouth, where the permanent landing was made at Plymouth Rock.

R. E. C. W., Finley, Pa. 1. In what sense are we to understand the meaning of Luke 12: 51-53? 2. Do you think the deluge was world-wide?

1. That wars and family divisions would result from Christ's coming. He did not mean that he came for the purpose, but that they would ensue as a consequence. We know that it was so. Families were divided and the father hated the son for becoming a Christian, and the mother the daughter. 2. Probably not. The purpose for which it was sent would be answered if the inhabited portions of the world were submerged.

A. J. B., Stewartville, Minn. Were the divisions of time in the Bible, such as the weeks mentioned by Daniel (10: 2), the same as with us?

It is generally believed that in the age you mention, the week was the ordinary week like ours; but in Daniel 9 the weeks are prophetic weeks and indicate a period of seven years each. It is doubted by many scholars whether the years of the early patriarchs, such as Methuselah (Gen. 5: 27), were our years. It is thought possible that in those early times the people calculated their time by the moon, which would be easier for them than by the sun. If so, their year may have been only twenty-eight days. This, however, is merely a guess; there is no basis for it, except probabilities.

A. J. W., Cherry Valley, Ill. Is there any passage commanding us to abstain from meat on fast-days, or at other times?

No; the custom arose as a memorial of Christ's death on that day. Christ did not ordain any days of fasting, so far as we know. It is probable that Jewish Christians observed the Jewish fasts, but there is no record of their imposing them on the Church generally. Christ's mention of the practice (Matt. 6: 16) appears to have applied to voluntary fasting.

J. E. R., Cheshire. Unquestionably names were for a long period confined to a simple given name or appellation, to which was added "the son of So and So." The earliest names were doubtless given because of some likeness, or some physical or mental characteristic, or because of the calling or avocation. Thus, strong, little, brown, red, smith, carpenter, baker, mason, etc. (or their equivalents in the early languages), became names. In the early ages there were no family names, as we now know them. Family names had their origin, it is believed, about the 10th century A.D. J, Y, U or G had the sound of

Farmer's Boy Coming Home from Work

A RURAL FESTIVAL IN JAPAN

By MATTHIAS KLEIN, Choshi, Shimosa

WHILE out on a trip from our station at Choshi with a few other workers recently, we reached a town where the el had never been preached, nor even tracts distributed. This village, which cattered all along the hillsides, is inhabited chiefly by farmers, who diligently uccessfully cultivate one of the largest rice fields between here and Tokio. As as the first of April one can see the farmers, both men and women, knee deep e cold mud, toiling there all the day long. Rarely is a plow used in this coun- out the soil is worked with a hoe. Some men are staggering through the mud baskets of fertilizer, others hoeing, while many of the women are doing yet r work, as they are not only knee deep in the mud, but also have their hands ip to their elbows, filling up every uneven place and working the soil as a n would knead dough. All this e preparatory to the sowing of ce, which a few weeks later will nsplanted to larger fields. Before ce is sown, the farmers have it -soaked in bags lying out in the over which paper prayers to the gods are floating, fastened to oo poles. This is done, of course, ure a good crop.

this place many tracts were dis- ed and several open-air meetings At night the meeting was really erful. A large crowd gathered centrally located building, and ly listened to the story of the The presentation of the cruci- Christ is very obnoxious to the e in the beginning, but as soon as understand it, it is the most ual truth in turning them to the God.

e name of this town, in English, "Waterfalls town," because of autiful natural scenery, including ber of miniature waterfalls. A like this in Japan is always d to religious purposes, even as rous Israel resorted to "high and green trees." Back from llage, up among the lofty hills, und an old, somewhat dilapidated temple, where we saw an immense crowd of al pilgrims coming over the hills, singing and ringing little bells. Arriving their long journey, they did not even stop for a drink of water, but passion- dashed up the steps of the temple, and there, en masse, standing before the hist idols, they sang in a low-pitched monotone, at the same time swaying side to side, keeping time with their litany.

ite a force of pilgrim priests, some with their big black hats, insignia and ers, also arrived in front of the temple. The chief priest of this temple accorded us the privilege of taking his photograph in front of his house—a very uncommon favor. He was arrayed in a stately, bright crimson robe. Before the entrance building of this noted temple stood the life-sized gods of war, fierce-looking and curiously painted. Walking a short distance in another direction, up a flight of stone steps, we were confronted by a beautifully curved tunnel through a hill. As we walked through it, we counted eighty-eight idols, each about two feet high, lining the sides. At the other end there was unexpectedly presented to us an exquisitely beautiful view. Before us was a lovely waterfall, whose silvery ice-cold thread of water pattered down on an idol planted on the rock below. Here we saw the tall smooth-barked cedars, as well as a variety of other evergreen trees. Upon the shining over-damp rocks creep various mosses, and over upon the sloping hill conspicuously stood the attractive camellia trees, lavishly loaded with their beautiful red flowers. And just as delightful was the ground, amid evergreen shrubbery, literally covered with the fallen blossoms. Going on a little farther, we came to another of these falls, which bestowed its waters upon the horrid looking serpent god beneath.

Buddhist Priests Leaving the Temple at Choshi

Many sick and insane people resort to this place, especially during the summer, and some even in the mild winter. They believe if they allow the water of these falls to pour down on their heads, in sight of these serpent gods, they will be cured. They ordinarily take three such shower baths a day, each lasting about thirty minutes. Some have been here five years or longer, and still show all the usual signs of insanity. These patients, both men and women, are under the supervision of a man who is the servant of the temple in or near which they reside. We saw two of these unfortunate ones, each standing under a waterfall. The constant groans of one while undergoing this ordeal, echoed from one hillside to another. Another was a young man about six feet tall, also demented. When his attendant released him, he seemed to be stiff and literally blue. Some of these patients at times were almost numb, and looked fainting when they came out of the water. When the temperature of the water is not too low, there is no doubt that some of these nervously diseased mortals are really helped, as the residents of this place assert.

What the Buddhist priests do in the daytime we do not know, but they are surely up early in the morning. We have observed them beating their drums as early as three o'clock. The writer

HAND IN HAND WITH GOD

TEXT: Isa. 41: 13—"For I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee"

ISAIAH is very bold. He promises that the hand we throw up in our weakness and helplessness shall be caught by the hand of omnipotence. In our loneliness we shall feel God near. The silence which can be felt shall be broken by his tender whisper, "Fear not; I will help thee." It is very daring, for our prophet has but now exhausted the splendors and sublimities of inspired rhetoric in his endeavor to describe the majesty of God. His sentences are a living glory. They rise unbidden to our lips when our hearts would fain employ the noblest strains of praise. God is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth; that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in. He calleth all the stars by name; by the greatness of his might, and for that he is strong in power, not one is lacking. He is the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth. He fainteth not, neither is he weary; there is no searching of his understanding. To him the nations are as a drop of a bucket; they are counted as the small dust of the balance; he taketh up the isles as a very little thing! And this God is our own. And he it is, in the amplitude of his power, in the infinity of his majesty, who will hold our right hand and say, "Fear not; I will help thee."

Divine Help Needed

Are you strong enough and big enough and brave enough to dispense with religion and its help? Can you do without God? Are you so certainly the master of your fate, the captain of your soul, and are you so confident that you always will be, that you can afford to despise or ignore the eternal promises of God?

What is your life? It begins, says the pessimist, in a cry of pain, and it ends with a sigh of relief. Youth, says the brilliant statesman, novelist, cynic, is a blunder, manhood a struggle, old age a regret. I repudiate these descriptions of human experience. I thank God for the pleasure that our happy lifetime gives. I bless the Giver of all good for the mirth and laughter of our days. But, doing so, I know too well "what thorns lie in every path; what sighs, what sorrows, and what tears lie between a mother's arms and death's embrace;" what multitudinous conflicts and buffetings of fortune wait for every one of us before we come to the last fight of all, the last and the best, to make light of man's need of a God. And when I ask you: Can you face it all without religion? The answer which I offer is: How foolish of you to try! Here is comfort in every sorrow, companionship in all loneliness, power for the re-vitalization of every drooping energy, courage, inspiration and immortal hope. Being what you are—men, and not heroic monsters of flawless perfection—it is madness and folly to spurn the outstretched hand of God.

The Universal Problem

Consider this matter well, and you will find yourselves in sight of a solution of the outstanding problem of human history. How does it come about that some men accomplish so much, while we, made of the same flesh and blood and human spirit, not so greatly inferior to them in mere capacity and knowledge, live on at this poor dying rate, and pass away—sparrows, indeed, that have flown out of the darkness behind into the light of the camp-fire for a moment, and then out to the darkness beyond? Men like ourselves, women such as you, have subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the power of the sword, from weakness were made strong, waxed mighty in war with the vested interests of evil, turned to flight armies of threatening foes. Of them the world, as they found it, was not worthy; but they left it worthier for their living. Tell us, ye students of history and of men, wherein their mighty strength lay! And amongst ourselves, too, do you think it is sheer weight of brain, or vigor of blood, or breadth of education that conditions our achievements or dooms us to sterility—strength which may be simple brutality, brain-power which may be nothing but selfish cunning, and culture to turn our literature into license and our arithmetic into roguery? Science does not build men. One man of large learning may scientifically cure a fever or invent a safety lamp, while another scientifically blows up a city or poisons a nation. All depends on what you do with your science when you have it! The secret of life lies deeper than this. Like the secret of the Lord, it is with them that fear him. And the mightiest strength of man is reserved for him who walks hand in hand with God.

In the dawn of history Abraham abandoned the star worship and nature adoration of his fathers in ancient Chaldea, satisfied that the Judge of all the earth would assuredly do him right, and that the God of the heavens was his exceeding great reward. Moses, the man of God, organized the most far-reaching and tremendous revolt of a slave-race against bondage and despotism which universal history records, and changed the face of the world. Samuel laid not by might nor by power, but in the conviction that to obey was better than sacrifice, and to hearken to God's word better than the smoke and incense of ritual things. In this spirit Peter and John considered that they had not to hearken unto men, but unto God, and flung open the gates of the kingdom of heaven to the lowly and the poor. In this spirit, too, Paul turned in disdain from the beggarly elements, dead letters, and old things of a religion grown mechanical, to the glorious Gospel of the blissful God; to a salvation wide as all human life, deep as all human need, assuring for the race in the far-off consummation of God's eternal purposes a future of unimaginable splendor which should outshine the golden glory of its dawn.

The men of the next generation, called to be a kingdom and priests unto God, as far as the east is from the west, carried the news of a Saviour's death, of life and immortality brought to light in his Gospel, and planted the banner of the Cross on the topmost pinnacles of the pagan world. Poor men, unlettered men, without human resources, earthly influence, wit and wisdom or wealth, did these things, God choosing the weak things of this world to confound the strong and bring his mighty kingdom in. Francis of Assisi left home, comfort, wealth and friends, vowing himself under that star-lit Umbrian night to woo his "sweet bride Poverty," and be true to her till death. Francis Xavier sought to fill up what remained of the sufferings of Christ, living and dying for them that sat in darkness and the shadow of death.

And how should I tell of Cromwell, with his pathetic plea, "Oh, how good it is to close with the Lord betimes!" Milton, of gift and faculty divine, learning in his blindness that the race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong, that they also serve who only stand and wait; Bunyan in his filthy den in Bedford jail, seeing visions and dreaming dreams which have cheered and saved and inspired millions of earth's children; or of Wesley, Whitefield, Howard, Raikes, Clarkson, Wilberforce, Garrison, Elizabeth Fry, Florence Nightingale, Josephine Butler, Catherine Booth, or George Müller, or Barnardo, or Moody, or General Booth, or of one in a million of those numberless unknown heroes as great as the greatest heroes known, who have acquitted themselves as men and women sent of God, and not so much possessing him as possessed and filled by him? Ask the secret of their strength; it is in God. And these all are what they are, and they have done what they did, because they knew that whatever happened the Lord their God would hold their right hand; and each one heard him say, "Fear not; I will help thee!"

Pagan Testimony

I have quoted to you names that the Christian world holds dear. But listen now to Socrates, as he stands in the presence of death: "My friend, if you think that a man of any worth at all ought to reckon the chances of life and death when he acts, or that he ought to think of anything but whether he is acting rightly or wrongly, and as a good man or a bad man would act, you are grievously mistaken. Wherever a man's post is, whether he has chosen it of his own will or whether he has been placed at it by his commander, there it is his duty to remain and face the danger, without thinking of death or any other thing, except dishonor. Meletus and Anytus can do me no harm. That is impossible; for I am sure that God will not allow a good man to be injured by a bad one. They may indeed kill me, or drive me into exile, or deprive me of my civil rights; and perhaps Meletus and others think those great evils. But I do not think so; I think that it is a much greater evil to do what they are doing now, and to try to put a man to death unjustly."

That is the ground we need. For our physical life we need a stable earth, a firm footing, an assured order of day and night, summer and winter, seedtime and harvest, and a reign of law. Just as certainly we need ground of assurance in a moral order, in an over ling Providence, an ordering and ordaining Will, a an unfailing, encircling love. We need the conviction nat we are called, chosen, commanded, sent; that we ive a place in God's plan; that we are part of an eternal system, indispensable in his everlasting purpose and only responsible for loyal and dutiful obedience his will as far as we know it. This is strength. T is compactness for our life. This is cohesion of p ose and faculty. This is peace and rest, and calm p as-tence, and the joy of living. This is how we co to ourselves and to our kingdom. This is how w and our manhood and womanhood, and enter into fe.
This is what it is to feel that our right hand i eld by God, and to hear him say, "Fear not; will help thee."

You have heard a pagan saint in the hour of ldshaking tragedy. May I now quote to you, tho it be in the nature of an anti-climax, a good wom of our own time who speaks her soul concerning the tle worries and distractions of every day; for small oubles, as everybody knows, often constitute a g ter trial of faith and patience than big ones. It is F ces Ridley Havergal who speaks:—

Cheerful Acquiescence

"If we are always and equally ready to do w soever the King appoints, all the trials and vex one arising from any change in his appointments, gr or small, simply do not exist. If he appoints me to ork there, shall I lament that I am not to work her If he appoints me to wait indoors to-day, am I be annoyed because I am not to work out-of-doors? f I meant to write his messages this morning, shall I amble because he sends interrupting visitors, rich or oor, to whom I am to speak them, or show kindne for his sake, or at least obey his command 'Be court s'?
If all my members are really at his disposal, why uld
I be put out if to-day's appointment is some ple work for my hands or errands for my feet, i ead of some seemingly more important doing of he on tongue?"

In the same tone speaks another good wom to good women, Harriet Beecher Stowe: "Talk of ur-cloth shirts, and scourgings, and sleeping on ash as means of saintship! There is no need of them our country. Let a woman once look at her do stic trials as her hair-cloth, her ashes, her scour s,— accept them,—rejoice in them,—smile and be iet, silent, patient, loving under them,—and the c ent can teach her no more; she is a victorious saint!"

While the words of John Ruskin are good for all:
"God is a kind Father. He sets us all in the ces where he wishes us to be employed; and that e oy-ment is truly our Father's business. He chooses ork for all creatures which will be delightful to th if they do it simply and humbly. He gives us ays strength enough and sense enough for what he nts us to do. If we either tire ourselves or puzzle ur-selves, it is our own fault. And we may alwa be sure, whatever we are doing, that we cannot be as-ing him, if we are not happy ourselves."

And, as I bring together these exhortations the obviously great with the apparently trivial, yo an understand how men and women who have work up into a habit of their soul the practice of relati all things to God's purpose and referring all things his will, seem to pass from the sphere of human we ess into that of the omnipotence of God. And I, at hat, can understand the heroic blend of Self-assertion with Self-abnegation which Macauley the historian found in the Pu ans.

"The very meanest of them was a being to whos ate a mysterious and terrible importance belonge on whose slightest action the spirits of light and da ess looked with anxious interest, who had been de ed, before heaven and earth were created, to en a felicity which should continue when heaven and rth should have passed away." Their strength was hat it was because the Lord their God held their right and and bade them, "Fear not; I will help thee!"

Wherefore, brethren, I would have you seek this mightiest strength that man can find. There are urs of stress and strain, of temptation and passion, hen
we would have God hold back our passionate lds.
There are days when this world and its pleasure are costing us too dear, and when again he must hol our eager hands in his. There are times of doubt and pon when we wonder if he is, and why he does not now

THE JUBILEE OF PRAYER

AMOUS throughout the Christian world is the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting in New York, the organization of which, fifty years ago, is to be celebrated in a jubilee week, from October 13 to ber 20. In every section of our own land, in the hes across the Atlantic, and in missionary stations athen lands, the name of the Fulton Street Prayer ing awakens cherished memories in many a faith- art. Few earnest Christians but have heard the erful stories associated with that hallowed place. es of men weighed down under a burden of anxiety, nowing where to go, nor what course to take, en- g that little room and presenting their case, coming with the burden , and light shed heir dark path. es of men doubt- hether there is a loving and guid- is creatures, find- n that room the nce of his pres- and realizing in own souls the r and tenderness providence.

the Lord, and he whose ear is ever open to the cry e afflicted has sent answers of peace. The Chris- knows that the Lord is in every place, but he ed to be specially present in that room to which resorted who believed that God is the rewarder of that diligently seek him.

y by day for fifty years, at the noon hour, has the of prayer and praise been raised in that room. de was the din of the hurrying traffic, the shouts of eager in buying and selling; within a stone's the exchanges in which millions of dollars passed from hand to hand; the courts in which trials of thrilling interest were going forward—yet within, alone with God, were men who found there "the secret of his presence," "a pavilion from the strife of tongues." There the business man oppressed with the dread of ruin; the father whose child lay miles away in the shadow of death; the sorrowing parent whose wandering son was lost in the mazes of sin; men in the agonies of distress of every kind, resorted to him who is able to save when human help fails, and they found rest and peace in faith.

The records of the prayers offered at that meeting and the remarkable answers acknowledged, faithfully made by Jeremiah Lanphier, the saintly man who organized it and who to the day of his death was rarely absent from it, are a wonderful testimony. They show such varieties of human need as to impress the reader with a sense of the world's fearful aggregation of sin and woe, which, when it was laid on that devoted head in Gethsemane, forced from the pores of his body great drops of blood. Surely he bore our griefs and carried our sorrows, and as we read the records of that meeting we learn what a burden they must have been. More than eight thousand requests for prayer in a single year have been sent in, and they have come from every land under the sun, showing that all the sons of men are subjects of trouble and there is no place that is free from the curse.

It was a wise and thoughtful thing that Jeremiah Lanphier did in that troubled autumn of 1857, when he organized that humble meeting. He knew that there were many men who asked incredulously, "What profit should we have if we pray unto him?" but he was convinced that there must be some men in the city who believed in prayer. The Dutch Reformed Church complied with his request to place a room at his disposal every day to test his confidence. Only six persons came, but soon the number grew to forty, and so on till the room would not hold all who came. During the following years, when the shadow of the Civil War lay heavy over the land and men were concerned for the lives of their brothers and sons, the meetings were crowded, and until the end of Mr. Lanphier's life there was no failure of the seeking multitudes. The meeting has been carried on since then and still continues under the presidency of Mr. Jacobs, as a testimony of the faith of Christians in the efficacy of prayer.

It was right that such a jubilee as this should be celebrated. Dr. David J. Burrell, who will give the historical address on the occasion, will have an impressive story to tell; Mr. Troy, of Madison, N. J., who will preach the sermon, and Dr. S. D. Gordon, who is to give some of his "Quiet Talks," will have in that room an illustration multiplied a thousand-fold of the solemn, heart-stirring moments in which the human has held communion with the divine.

WON BY A MOTHER'S PRAYERS

NE of the best known evangelists in this country to-day is Charles Norton Hunt, ex-Judge of a Western city, the story of whose ersion through a mother's prayers ecently told in the Bowery Mission. ive below the substance of the nar- e, as told by the Judge himself:

was born of humble parentage. I born in the West. I had a good of work to do as a farmer boy. I letermined in my own heart I wanted a lawyer. I entered the university lad of eighteen. I continued to drift, formed careless companionships. I got beyond the Bible. It was good gh for father and mother on the farm, did not need it. I took up infidel lit- re. I drifted and drifted.

married a beautiful Christian girl. e I made her Christian life difficult, mock of her religious views, she ontinued faithful, and her influence much to do in finally bringing me into Christian life.

was fortunate in business. About I had considerable political place and r. I was elected municipal Judge offered re-election. I had success in law and politics. People said I successful. I knew I was failing each

It was not some public thing that ne thinking. It was the first child came to us, and the fact that she was ng up without the example and tian training that I had received my parents.

My mother often came to visit me. e visits were very trying to me. She the Bible and prayed, and that was a ise to the children. She was praying g the day and during the night, and know when mother prayed it was with ncertain sound. There was no use for any one to try to sleep. She intended her prayers to have effect. I often used to say to her, 'Mother, don't; it only makes me worse,' but she did it, and I am grateful now that she did continue her prayers for me.

"About 1886-7, I made a change of location. I established a law business in Minneapolis, and this gave me an opportunity to change my life, but I had no intention of becoming a Christian.

Judge Charles N. Hunt

"One night my mother-in-law invited me to go to church with her. Bishop Whipple preached. He had for his text 'The Prodigal Son.' I did not call myself a prodigal, but I was touched by the sermon, and went away tender and thoughtful. I had a troublesome night. I was not a believer in dreams or visions, or in the call of God, but there seemed to be a presence in the room, and a voice said, 'You can win juries, go win men to Christ.' (I had won eleven or twelve out of fourteen cases in succession.)

"In answer I said, 'I need some one to win me to Christ.' A second time the voice said, 'Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet to show my people their sins.' I said, 'Lord, I need some one to show me my sins.'

"Going to my law office the next morning I took up a Bible which I had for use in referee cases. I read the fifty-eighth chapter of Isaiah, which shows in a marked way the difference between formal profession and a vital religion. Under that impression I wrote to my mother, who was at a distance. You can imagine the gladness of her heart. She said it was in answer to her prayers.

"For six years after this I was in darkness. I spent a great deal of money for liquor, but I did not get drunk. Then the appetite for tobacco. If it was for the poor heathen, I could scarcely afford a quarter, yet I could spend $1.50 a day for tobacco. A prayer meeting was a dull place, but I could go to a card party or dance or theatre. I know now what it is to hate the old life; to pass from death into life and to become a new creature in Christ Jesus; but then these things had not left me. I was not willing to surrender to Christ.

"After six or seven years, in 1893, there was a series of united meetings in our town. I did not like them. I thought they were sensational, emotional, reactionary. Because of the position I held, I knew I would be chosen on a committee. I knew Mrs. Hunt would want to go. I did not intend to go to one meeting.

"However, I went, and we took a seat under the gallery. I thought, 'There is the biggest lot of fools in Minneapolis.' I watched them come in—100 ministers, 500 to 600 in the choir. A little fellow came out with a pleasant face. I asked my wife who he was. She said, 'Mills.' I thought, 'I am not afraid of him.' When he began to talk, I thought my wife had told him all about me. All he said was so searching. I longed for a hole in the floor that I might fall through. It was the conviction going deep. Next day I made up my mind I would be man enough to bring in the family altar my father had. I never got away from the influence of that early training. When I had finished with the reading of the Bible and the little service we were all in tears. I started to go down town. There was an early morning prayer meeting, and I walked in. There were about fifty of the faithful there. The pastor immediately said, 'Will Brother Hunt lead us in prayer?' I started to make some kind of formal prayer. God changed the prayer on my lips. I said, 'Lord, open the way for me. I am ready this morning. Ready for service. Ready for sacrifice.' I knew what it meant. The tears came. I made my confession, before that little group, of those years of hypocrisy.

"For twelve years I have been in active service in the different States and Territories and Canada, and across the water. I never knew what it was to live until I became a Christian. My mother's prayers were answered. She is past eighty now and is still praying for her son."

Russia's Homes in Peace Time

Russian Women Working in the Fields

The Poor Abode of a Russian Peasant Family

COMING to Russia for the first time, I find the people extremely kind and hospitable. Wherever I turn, the helping hand is reached forth. I know without saying that it is often needed. English is scarcely spoken at all, French but little, and German much less than I had supposed. In a country where ninety per cent. of the population cannot read or write their own language, there are many difficulties for a stranger to encounter. If I request the maitre d'hotel to write an address in Russian for me, it is more than likely that the cab-driver cannot read it. Then some kind soul is sure to come to the rescue at the right moment. Indeed, such painstaking courtesy I have seldom met with.

Strolling one day through the Assumption Cathedral, with a French Baedeker for companion (no English edition being printed for Russia), I asked a priest who stood near me to show me the exact spots where the Czars are crowned and consecrated. He did so. A few moments later a woman approached, and said in French:

"Madame, I come at the request of the priest; he is interested in you as an American, and has instructed me to show you every attention."

She took me about that day and several other days, showing me many things that I believe strangers often miss.

It is forbidden to take photographs inside the Kremlin without a permit. I had been sent from one place to another to get this permit, and finally was told that the only man who could grant it lived in St. Petersburg. I was turning away in despair when a gentleman stepped up and asked, in very good English, if he could assist me. I told him what I wished, and he said at once:

"I can get it for you."

Russian Courtesies

It proved to be Mr. George Arseniev, chamberlain to his majesty the Czar of Russia, and also conservator of the Museum of Arms in the Kremlin. He had visited America with the Grand Duke Alexis, thirty years ago. He had been entertained at the Century Club of Boston, and had known Longfellow, Bryant, and Bayard Taylor. He cherished such pleasant memories of America, he said, that he was happy to be of use to an American. He procured the permit in about five minutes. But his courtesies did not end there. He invited me to see the coronation robes and crown jewels in the palace. Of course I accepted, as this was a rare privilege, now that they are no longer shown to the public, owing to the disturbed state of the country.

The deliberate way in which business is transacted in Russia is amusing. The first thing done in the banks and business houses (they open at ten o'clock) is to serve tea. A glass of tea, with a slice of lemon beside it, stands on every desk.

The middle classes show a good deal of common sense. They are eager for information about other countries and speak freely about their own. This, I am told, has only been the case for the last year or two. Women have more liberty than they usually have in European countries, except in one respect: they must obey their husbands, and one may not even take a journey without the husband's written permission.

Although the Russian Church encourages learning, there is very little of it among the peasant classes. The peasants are a people apart. They even have a patron saint of their own. They take their baths (vapor) in the oven, and sometimes sleep in it, if the night is cold and the family large. Frequently two or three branches of a family live in one cottage, which, however small, is pretty sure to have a large oven built in its wall. On St. George's day (the 23d of April, old style), the cattle are brought out and sprinkled. The summer is so short and the winter so long, that the poor creatures are scarcely at their best before it is time for them to return to their cramped shelter and straw diet. From June till the end of August, men and women are busy making hay, and the cowboy is also active. The land is fertile, but frightfully neglected both as to agriculture and forestry. Fortunately, this year the crops are good. The uncultivated, exhausted, ill-treated soil is doing its best for the husbandman.

Of course, there is a great amount of distress and poverty following in the famine's wake. This the government is taking measures to relieve. Though Prime Minister Stolypin, available grain has been bought up for distribution in the famine-swept districts as occasion demands.

The Condition of the Peasants

The most cordial feeling towards Americans exists everywhere in this country. Russia evidently has not forgotten the grain-laden steamship Leo, chartered and loaded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that came to her shores from America in her sorest need.

This year there is practically no famine. The crops are good, even in Samara and Perm, districts where the distress was greatest. Of course, there is suffering—plenty of it. In journeying from Warsaw to Moscow, I saw whole villages deserted, and was told that the inhabitants had left them to go to the districts lying along the Trans-Siberian Railroad. This road is working a great change throughout Russia. It has opened up new territory, and the government is offering inducements for farmers and other settlers to take up land. Between Moscow and the Ural Mountains, the Trans-Siberian passes through districts which have distinct characteristics of their own. There are rich villages with outlying wastes; great stretches of plain and forest, and mining districts where all sorts of Socialistic troubles exist. These mines in the Ural Mountains produce three-quarters of all the iron in Russia and ninety per cent. of all the platinum in the world. Some of them have been working since 1623. The peasants prefer working in the mines and foundries to agriculture. They are too poor to fertilize the land properly, although the government is trying to assist them and has opened land banks, where they may get land loans at two or three per cent. interest, they show little desire to take advantage of them. If a little is done for them, they at once think it is the duty of the government to do more. They see no reason why they should jolt over rough roads in long, springless wagons, the home-made dugas towering above their horses' necks, while others are driving horses in gay trappings three abreast. I believe it is really blank ignorance more than envy that produces rebellion among these people.

Of course, the under-current of dissatisfaction affects other classes and extends

he soldiery. The general sentiment here among the better classes, and those holding Socialistic views, is that the government is trying to help the people help themselves, while at the same time holding a tight rein over them.

At present the government has the situation well in hand. Premier Stolypin, ose life has been attempted and who is in hourly danger, is fearlessly and unishly devoted to the interests of his country, and enjoys the confidence and ndship of the Emperor.

Learning about the German villages which have existed in Russia since the e of Catherine II., who offered freedom from taxation and other inducements to mans who would come to teach the Russians agricultural methods, I drove out e ten or twelve miles from Moscow to see one. This village, though poor, ked neat and thrifty, the little plots called fields seemed well cared for, and children were tidy and rugged. I continued my drive to a Russian hamlet, ere the neglected-looking grounds that surrounded their houses and huts conced me that German methods of agriculture were not likely to prevail here.

Echoes of the Insurrection

Speaking with Dr. Lambie, an American who has lived in Russia sixteen years, compared the lower peasant classes in Russia to the negro classes of America. thought that they were much alike, and that they held about the same relative itions. He gave me some vivid descriptions of scenes witnessed from his office dow during the insurrection. He pointed out a large court opposite his window, which the soldiers drove the people indiscriminately. They were then searched, l those who were unarmed were allowed to pass out. But those unlucky ugh to be found with any kind of weapon upon them were shot or beaten with butt ends of muskets, and left to drag themselves away bleeding, and often ng. Seeing the doctor at his window, the soldiers were about to fire upon him l he not sprung away.

Even now the effects of the insurrection are everywhere visible. I met a lady o told me the history of the ruin of her house. Her grandfather had been mberlain to Alexander II. Her property, containing shops on the ground r, is situated near the soldiers' barracks, and for that reason no merchant will the risk of renting it.

The Trans-Siberian Railway has robbed the Great Fair at Nijny-Novgorod miliarly called "Ningy" by the Russians) of its unique and most picturesque tures. Formerly, people from every part of the White Czar's domains, among m Tartars, Bachkirs, and men from Penza, wrapped in goat skins, came to the r yearly to barter with merchants from the East and others from western eria. These came with caravans of camels laden with goods to exchange for ar, grain and metal. Now they can send their goods by rail, and though many the merchants still come to meet and settle yearly accounts, it is pretty safe to dict that the famous fair will soon be a thing of the past.

The city on the Moskva has many names of endearment. It is called "The tle Mother," "The White City" and "The Holy City." The Russians have a ing that "There is nothing above Moscow except the Kremlin, and nothing ve the Kremlin except heaven."

I can understand that to the Russians it is sacred ground. To me it is beauti, wonderful, fascinating; and I scarcely know how to leave it.

BREAD BETTER THAN DIPLOMACY

THE bread which readers of The Christian Herald cast upon the waters of the Grand Canal of China is likely to return after many days in a form little dreamed of by those whose warm hearts responded to the plea of hungry manity. There are portentous doings afoot in China to-day. She has now olutely determined upon new forms and new methods of civilization. It is a nmon remark that more progress has been made in China during the past two ars than in the preceding two thousand years. Newspapers are springing up over the land—would that there were a Christian daily there!—and those who not read are having the papers read to them. For this purpose public lecture lls are being established in some of the cities. The dominant political spirit is e of hostility to the Manchu rulers. Everybody knows the Empress Dowager is t a Chinese but a Manchu, one of the line of China's ancient conquerors. All e Manchu families in the empire receive a pension from the government, even ugh they do not a stroke of work for it.

China has suffered many things at the hand of the white man. She has good son to regard him as her enemy. The oppression and injustice which the Chinese dure from foreigners is patent to any one who spends a month in the Flowery ngdom. But this antagonism to foreigners is no longer the old blind, self-ficient, unreasoning hatred of ten years ago. Just as the Chinese are coming to tinguish between missionaries, so that officials now do not blame Protestant ssionaries for the injustices perpetrated by the French Jesuits, so also they are ning to see the difference between foreigners. They are gradually learning t America wants none of their territory, and that she wants only to deal fairly d honorably by them—which is more than can be said of some other nations.

But more direct, tangible and influential than any recent happening in the ient is the relief of the Chinese famine by American charity. Because China w has newspapers and telegraphs, the story of the famine and of famine relief, ich once would have been kept within the affected district, has now gone over e empire. America's interest and America's practical help have been read with derstanding eyes. If, as many believe, America is to have a new place in foreign ations with China, no small part of the credit must be due to the readers of E Christian Herald, who, with no thought of statecraft, obeyed the promptgs of the spirit of the compassionate Christ within their hearts.

It is worth saying, and it ought to be said by some other than one of The ristian Herald editors, that this famine relief would scarcely have been possible cept for The Christian Herald. It was to it that all eyes involuntarily turned. en on the other side of the world the paper has become known as the sufferg world's helper. Before any word was received from New York, it was expected t The Christian Herald would be first, foremost and last in extending aid smitten China. Its support was the principal asset upon which the relief mmittees counted. How well this reputation has been vindicated, its readers ready know.

Bishop Ingram's Message

WORDS peculiarly modern were chosen by Dr. Ingram, Bishop of London, as the text of his recent sermon in Trinity Church, New York. An audience highly cultured, extraordinarily wealthy, and immensely influential, was gathered before him, and he spoke at the busiest hour of the day, with Wall Street and all its stupendous affairs close at hand. In that historic church there must have been persons whose wealth and power could scarcely be equaled in any city on earth. The Bishop had them there listening to his voice for a brief hour, and he might well have hesitated about the subject he should choose for his discourse. He chose the subject of stewardship, with the impressive words of Christ as his text: "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward."

The Bishop said he chose those words as being "peculiarly modern." The audience would understand his characterization. They were spoken nineteen centuries ago, but they are modern because they apply to modern life. Never has there been an age since Christ uttered them, in which there was such urgent need for men to remember them. The Bishop did wisely in reminding such an audience as he had, of the words, and of Him who spoke them. In the course of his life he has come in contact with all classes from the poorest of the poor to the millionaire, and it is easy to imagine what a depth of meaning he would perceive in the divine saying. He dwelt on the sorrows and miseries of the poor as he had witnessed them and expressed his sympathy with the misguided men who find it hard to reconcile their condition with the fatherhood of God. No religious teacher is more earnest and sincere than he in his faith in that fatherhood, but he could understand a superficial thinker doubting it in the face of the facts.

From this side of the question he passed to the responsibilities of the rich, and he plainly intimated that the two aspects were in close relation. He was no advocate of socialism, for he believed that the early Christians, who had all things in common, were wrong; but there was a solution between the two extremes. It was the responsibility of stewardship, which applied as much to the boy with his pocket money as to the millionaire—responsibility in acquiring and responsibility in spending—a responsibility for which an account has to be given. It was on the realization of that stewardship that the Bishop's hopes of the future are based. To this he looks for the solution of the problems of capital and labor and for the purification of social and municipal life. And the stewardship extends beyond money; it includes, as he pointed out, personal service. In a word, it is the sense of brotherhood, the realization that the sorrows and miseries of the poor are the concern of the rich, and that men in every station are stewards and not owners. Society needed to be reminded that this is the principle of Christianity, and the Bishop deserves our thanks for calling public attention to the fact.

Old Age Pensions Abroad

ONE of the significant movements of the times in Great Britain is that which looks to furnishing State provision for the worthy and deserving aged poor. At the recent Trades Union Congress in Bath, the subject was under discussion and the president of the Congress declared the problem of the aged poor to be the most urgent one now before the British people. That some measure looking to old age pensions will be introduced at the next session of Parliament is reasonably certain. An attempt to pass any law of the character suggested by the Trades Congress, however, would be likely to lead to one of the greatest parliamentary struggles ever known.

Assuming that 5,500,000 persons out of the total population of Great Britain would be beneficiaries under an old age pension system, it is estimated that the annual expenditure would not be far below $360,000,000. This would give to each of the pensioners a weekly allowance of $1.25. It would constitute such a tremendous addition to the budget that the government is already looking about for available sources of revenue. There are some who think it not improbable that the vast funds and estates belonging to the Established Church might be applied to this purpose. To say that such a scheme, publicly advocated, would encounter much opposition, would be to characterize it too mildly. It would be very likely to excite one of the most violent conflicts that country has witnessed within the memory of her oldest living statesmen.

Germany is far in advance of all other governments in its methods of dealing with the old age pension problem. There, the beneficiary, the employer, and the State all contribute to the pension fund, from which the worker draws a regular allowance on reaching a certain age. His pension is forfeitable, however, and in this regard the German system acts as a wholesome deterrent to crime and dissipation, for the average man will recoil at any temptation, his surrender to which might wholly deprive him of his provision for old age. This salutary apprehension contributes to good citizenship and decent living.

In our own land, old age pensions have not yet come to be regarded as an urgent economic question. It may be asked, however, and not without reason, whether the vast sums annually appropriated by the various States for the support of almshouses and similar institutions, which afford refuge both to the honest poor and the pauper criminal, are not, when totalized, far in excess of any fund that would be required to pension the worthy aged poor. There are thousands of old people who have lived decent, self-respecting, law-abiding lives, and who, through no fault of their own, have come to penury. To house them with the vicious and criminal is unjust and cruel, and costs the State probably more than if they were outdoor pensioners. Recent disclosures in several States have shown that the present almshouse system is so full of corrupt abuses as to call for sweeping reforms, which cannot come too soon.

Religious Liberals

CALVIN and his doctrines formed the principal subject of discussion in the International Congress of Religious Liberals which met at Cambridge, Mass., a few days ago, under the auspices of Harvard University. Almost at the outset Dr. Eliot described the tone and character of the assemblage. Harvard welcomed the Congress in the same spirit with which it welcomed all types of students—Christians, Jews, Confucians and Mohammedans—"each of whom is allowed his free choice to walk humbly with his God."

It was not until a proposition was made to endorse the project to erect a monument to Calvin in Geneva, the centre of his life work, that the storm arose. There was a strong dissension and a counter-proposition was moved to adopt a vote of sympathy toward Servetus, to whose death at the stake Calvin gave consent and approval. This was adopted unanimously.

But there was something in the nature of a dignified rebuke in the address of Professor Eduard Montet of Geneva, who, while avowing himself a "Liberal Protestant" and condemning the course of Calvin and his associates in the case of Servetus, yet found warrant for a eulogium of the great reformer. He said:

> Through the centuries which separate us men of the twentieth century from our religious ancestors of the sixteenth, through the lapse of time which has toned down differences and righted all things, the independent religious thinkers of to-day, forgetting the intolerance from which they have suffered, and judging doctrines with the impartiality of the historian of dogmas, can reach out a hand of fellowship to Calvin and his followers and call to them across the ages, "You and we belong to the same spiritual lineage; you and we are, in fact, children of the Reformation. It is, in truth, the same religious work which you started and undertook which we are carrying on and which we shall accomplish. It is the eternal Gospel, of which we are, after you and with you, the apostles and preachers."

Calvin's age was one of strong religious wars, personal antagonisms, and bitter persecution. He must be judged by the time in which he lived and worked, and not according to present conditions and standards. While he, with others, shared the human weaknesses of the period, the value of his labors for Christianity has been recognized by the Christian Church throughout the world, and nothing that can be said against them now by any body of "liberal" religionists can impair their worth. The stern doctrines peculiar to that period have been greatly modified in the passing centuries, but the Christian to-day, reading the remarkable story of Calvin's life, is still impressed with the sincerity, the courage, and the ability of a career which made an impression upon the religion of that time, second only to that produced by Luther himself.

The attack on Calvin was merely an incident in the Congress, and was siezed by some of the other speakers as affording an opportunity for a fling at the Christian religion. Such attacks are like pebbles cast into the flowing stream. Their ripples rise and spread in circles for a moment, but soon disappear and are forgotten.

The Prayers that God Answers

NO prayer of faith is ever without its answer. God's answers are not always in the affirmative. A prayer is a request, and it may be answered by a denial, and that denial may have in it the love of the Father's heart for his child, just as fully as if the petition had been granted. Did not our Saviour say, referring to prayer for our daily wants, "Your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things before ye ask him"?

A little girl in whose presence older people were discussing [the subject of answered prayer, remarked in a pause of the conversation, "I know all about it. I have had prayers answered myself." She went on to explain that some weeks before, when obliged to go quite often to the dreaded chair of the dentist, she had prayed that he might not hurt her. "That prayer," she said, "was not answered, but I changed it, and prayed that I might be brave and able to bear the pain without crying or making a fuss." The second prayer was answered at once. The spirit of fear was taken away, and courage and fortitude were given her. Shall any one think of this as a trivial illustration? Look beneath the surface.

When we pray for what is impossible, for what could not be given without setting aside the laws of the universe—like a little child who cries for the moon—does not God treat us as we treat our children many a time when we merely pass over their inexperience and folly? But when we pray for strength to bear the inevitable, for higher qualities of courage and endurance, for the grace to resist temptation, are the prayers thus sent to heaven ever denied at the throne?

In the crises of life, be they small or great, it is the Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom. "To every 'O my Father!' sleeps the answer, 'Here, my child.'"

Among the Workers

—GIPSY SMITH, the English evangelist, is to visit the States again next fall. He was booked this year to visit Australia, but the visit has been postponed in order to allow him to return to America. Arrangements are now being made by the Rev. Thomas Law, the National Free Church Council. Memorial Hall, London, E. C., for Gipsy Smith to take missions in the leading cities of the United States. The tour is to commence in September, 1908.

—MISSIONARY J. N. WRIGHT, of Tabriz, Persia, writes: "Just at present Persia is in a badly disturbed condition politically, and we have fear it may be much worse before the skies begin to clear. As yet, the mission work is going on as usual, except at Urumia, where the Sultan's troops and the Kurds are bringing about anarchy, as far as Persian authority is concerned. As yet, all the missionaries are unharmed, and the consuls are doing all that can be done for the protection of life and property."

—MRS. E. M. WHITTEMORE, founder of the Door of Hope, has just concluded a two months' Western tour, during which she held thirty-two meetings, including San Diego, Pasadena, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, San Jose, San Francisco, Oakland, Salt Lake, Chicago, Hamilton, Springfield, O., and Cleveland. During those gatherings in churches and halls, over 353 desired prayers. There was no special emotional excitement, but a real depth of spiritual awakening upon the part of those who made request. Some most interesting cases were personally dealt with.

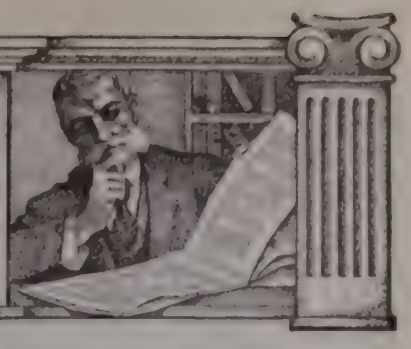
THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER



Vancouver's Problem

ONE of the most striking object lessons showing the conditions of the problem which is puzzling the citizens of Vancouver, B. C., is presented in the spectacle to be seen every Sunday in Stanley Pa[rk], the principal breathing place of that city. There m[ay] be seen representatives of almost every race on a[rth]. Sikhs from India with their Oriental turbans; Ch[in]ese with their pigtails; Japanese, easily distinguishab[le] in spite of their European costume; negroes and Ma[la]ys, all mingling with Americans and Europeans, m[ak]ing up a strange cosmopolitan crowd. The Tr[ad]es and Labor Congress of Canada has taken a determined stand on the subject of Japanese immigration and has sent a formal demand to Sir Wilfrid Laurier at Ottawa, for "the repatriation and exclusion of all Asiatics and all undesirable citizens from the East or West." They express the conviction that the immigrants are brought by capitalists with a view of introducing cheap labor to reduce wages, to the detriment of the wage-earners of the Dominion. There has also been a petition presented from hundreds of other citizens of British Columbia praying for an immediate abrogation of all treaties permitting the entrance of Asiatics, and demanding the passage of a law absolutely excluding Orientals from the country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has replied that the treaties denounced did not originally apply to Canada, but were formally ratified and ratified by the Canadian Parliament in response to repeated expressions of public opinion, and the object of securing a share of Japanese trade. That advantage has been gained to an astonishing extent, and would be forfeited by the passage of an exclusion act. He adds that the government will institute an inquiry into the causes which have led to the recent unusual influx of immigrants, with the view of adopting some system in cooperation with the Japanese government for regulating the volume of immigration. The premier's reply has caused grave dissatisfaction, and may lead to a continuance of the agitation. Meanwhile claims for indemnity for damages incurred in the riots are being prepared both by Canada and Japan, and if the Canadian government will not recognize them they will be sent to London. It may be hoped that whatever course is taken it will be by treaty and national negotiation, and not by violent attacks on the immigrants, which are inhuman and contrary to law, and to the injunction of God.

Thus saith the Lord: Execute ye judgment and righteousness, and do no wrong; do no violence to the stranger, neither shed innocent blood. (Jer. 22 : 3.)

To Check Emigration

An officer in the employ of the Norwegian government is now on a visit to this country to confer with emigrants from Norway. In explaining the object of his mission he stated that patriots in Norway had arrived at the conclusion that unless some measures were taken to stop "the blood-tapping process of emigration," their country would be seriously injured, if it did not ultimately cease to exist. An attempt was being made to keep young people in the land of their birth, and to this effort was now to be added a still more extended movement. The officer expressed the belief that many Norwegians now in America would return if assured of equally good economic and social conditions in their native country. The government is now engaged in devising a plan by which settlers may take homesteads as in America. This is one of the things being done in an effort to improve conditions for agricultural workers. Many will doubtless be attracted to the homeland by the advantages offered, unless they have become alien in spirit to the institutions of the Old World. There are many wanderers from God who, in spite of the promises he makes, do not return to him because they have not the spirit of God.

Being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, and without God in the world. (Eph. 2: 12).

An International Stamp

A new device for the convenience of persons having correspondence with citizens of other countries has been perfected. A person writing to a stranger in the United States and desiring an answer, puts in his letter a postage stamp to prepay reply. But if he is writing to a man in France, for example, and is not sure that his correspondent will incur the expense of sending a reply, he cannot do the same thing, because he has no French postage stamps. It has now been arranged by the officers of the Postal Union, that he may send a stamp devised for the purpose. Its value is five cents and the person receiving it may take it to his own post-office, where he can exchange it for a stamp of his own nationality. This applies to all countries in the Postal Union, including the United States, England, France, Germany, and other nations. The stamp will fill a long felt want. A man can never be sure that a stranger in a distant country will reply to his letter when doing so will involve expense without prospective advantage. It is not so when we present our petitions to God; for he answers even the unthankful who pray to him in sincerity.

Who hath God so nigh unto them as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon him for? (Deut. 4 : 7.)

Counterfeit Bills Afloat

Two men working on a scow in the East River, New York, a few days ago, noticed a package floating on the river. Thinking it might have been dropped by a passenger in a bridge car and might contain valuables, they drew it in with a boat-hook. To their amazement, they found on untying it, United States currency of the face value of $7,000. There was a scramble for the bills when the package was opened, but the finders were deeply disgusted on making a closer examination, when it was discovered that they were counterfeits. The police were promptly notified and they took possession of the package. They said that for some time they had been trying to trace a gang of counterfeiters who were doing business in Brooklyn. It is supposed that they had come so near to detecting the culprits that in alarm the holders had flung all they had into the river, as the quickest way of getting rid of the incriminating evidence. They had taken immense pains, and must have expended hard labor in making a good counterfeit, yet they sacrificed the result rather than be found with the work in their possession. They realized, as many will do in the day of judgment, that the treasures they had toiled to produce are worse than useless in the time of trial.

In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver and his idols of gold, which they made each one for himself to worship, to the moles and to the bats, for fear of the Lord. (Isa. 2 : 20-21.)

A Defendant's Fine

A singular scene was witnessed recently in a New York Police Court. A man was on trial for some trivial breach of the city laws. The case was clear and was fully proved; but there were extenuating circumstances. The judge inflicted the minimum penalty, which was a fine of two dollars. The defendant, however, was utterly without money and he pleaded with the judge to remit the fine. This the judge would have been willing to do, if it had been possible. He said that he could not in justice allow the man to go without punishment. Finally the struggle in his mind between pity for the defendant and the obligations of his office was solved by his producing two dollars from his own pocket, with which the defendant paid his fine, and with many thanks to the judge, left the court. We understand the judge's dilemma. He felt that the law must be vindicated and it was done at his own cost. Such an illustration should silence those who think it strange that God could not pardon the repentant sinner without an atonement.

That he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus (Rom. 3 : 26).

A Double Character

A strange case of dementia is reported to the New York Herald from Richmond, Ind. A graduate of Depauw University, a man of conspicuous ability and accomplishments, whose skill as a linguist was known throughout the State, has been committed to an asylum for the insane, and the doctors there give but slight hopes of his recovery. Some time ago he was deeply interested in the famous story by Robert Louis Stevenson of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. In that story Stevenson represents a physician as mixing a potion which, when taken, changed his personal appearance and character, so that the reputable and benevolent physician became a man mean and diabolically cruel. Another potion reversed the process and transformed him again to the physician. The story powerfully affected the young man, and the impression was deepened when he saw it dramatized on the stage. It was the delight of his friends to see him act the two parts, which he did with singular power. At first the change to his normal condition after his performance was effected quickly and easily. But after a time it was noticed that he could not get back to the normal without a strong mental effort. He was advised to cease the practice, but he was infatuated with the character and seemed unwilling to release himself from the spell of the personality he had assumed in a spirit of fun. He finally lapsed permanently into that despicable character and it has been found necessary to restrain him. Even the pretense of wickedness is dangerous; sin is a treacherous foe and its insidious power often grows strong before it is felt.

Now therefore be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong. (Isa. 28: 22.)

THE HOUSEHOLD CIRCLE

Secrets of Happiness

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN two young people choose each other out of all the world, and face in marriage a united future, they expect among other things to be happy. Should you ask the young husband and the young wife why they married, they would, of course, answer, "Because we loved one another and intended to have a happy home." They express a candid conviction, but cannot always secure results.

Three letters lie before my eyes in which are frank confessions as to the success of married life after a trial of several years. In one of them, the wife says positively, "My husband is as much my lover as when we were sweethearts. He comes up to my standard in every particular. He is manly, sincere and well-mannered, works steadily at his trade, and earns good wages. I am never refused money when I ask for it, and so far as is possible, my wishes are consulted and my desires gratified in the ordering of our house. But I am not satisfied. I find life very dull and dreary. I do not care for the society in which we can afford to move, and the society I desire does not care for me. I long for a beautiful home, with artistic furnishing, for pictures, flowers and luxuries that I am afraid will never be mine. Can you tell me how to overcome my discontent and be the wife my husband has the right to look for when he pours his weekly earnings into my lap?" This is letter number one.

Number two is very similar, with a difference. The writer says:

> Before my marriage I was one of a circle of cultivated young people who read and discussed the newest books, were familiar with the best literature, and from time to time indulged themselves in hearing good music. As a bride, I endeavored to keep up my reading and studies, and I had a fancy that Dick and I in our new home would meet precisely such people as had been my companions in my girlhood. Everything has turned out, so far as the outside world is concerned, in the most disappointing way you can think of. The young married people around us are worthy Christian people and do not lack intelligence. They are the kind who think a gramophone preferable to the finest piano, and who confine their reading to the newspaper and whatever is the equivalent of the dime novel. You may suppose, when I say this, that I am casting a slur on their religion, but they do go to church and read their Bibles. My trouble is that Dick and I have little in common with them. If we stay by ourselves, we are looked upon as patronizing and superior. If we associate much with them, we shall sink to their level. I am ashamed to admit that I have a grievance, but indeed I am blue most of the time, and poor Dick tells me that the girl he married, who was so bright and cheery, is rapidly vanishing from his sight. Do advise me. Are we never to be happy?

Letter number three is that rarest of epistles, an appeal for aid from a husband who is at his wits' end to discover what is wrong where he is sure everything should be right. Men do not rush to pen and ink as women do, and in the married state, husbands seldom criticize their wives in the hearing of third parties. The man who has reached the end of his patience and the end of his resources is infrequently found. This correspondent wistfully utters his plaint:

> Five years ago I brought my wife from her home in the East to a thriving town in the West. We started our little home with light hearts, for we had a nest egg in the savings bank, our health was good, our creeds were the same, and we loved each other, shall I say, to adoration. All went on splendidly, until one day my wife discovered that she had a talent for writing poetry. She sent her verses to a periodical for which I had subscribed, thinking that it would give us something to read on winter evenings. Woe is me! Her poem was accepted. It was printed and paid for. She has never had any success since, but she is sure that if she perseveres, the tide will turn. Meanwhile, she has lost interest in housekeeping, neglects the children, and lets me fend for myself as best I can. As I write to you, the chickens are straying over the kitchen floor, and the baby is screaming in the cradle, but my wife is deaf and blind to all except her inspiration. What is to be done?

There may be readers who will smile at the predicament of the husband with the literary wife, but he is entitled to commiseration, and so is she. Theirs will not be the first instance in which the lure of vanity and false sentiment has proved too great a temptation to be resisted by a woman with merely mediocre gifts and facility in making jingles. Occasionally it is philanthropic effort, public spirit or altruism that is the motive leading a wife to defer the actual duty for the fanciful dream that must prove fatal to home happiness. In such a case there is little to do except to hope for the return of that priceless quality, common sense. A fit of illness on the part of husband or child might have a remedial effect, but it is a pity that suffering should be increased on the chance of reform, and there is no certainty that even illness would bring about a cure.

The experience of the young couple who have intellectual tastes and ideals of culture, without the environment that would be favorable to their social aspirations, is not in the least singular. Their case may be paralleled every day in the week. They are probably too shrewd and level-headed to permit the wreck of solid, substantial happiness in their home life because of a temporary loneliness due to the fact that their neighbors are less liberally educated than themselves. There are several things they may do. They may start a reading club or a debating circle; they may invite their friends to spend an evening a week with them, and may provide refined and agreeable entertainment. They must be on the watch lest they give themselves airs, and permit a note of condescension to invade their manner. Above all, the wife must resolutely banish the blues. The wife must remember that her husband cannot be at his best if he is compelled to drive away her low spirits when he comes home. She must be the angel of good cheer in the home.

With the writer of the first letter one cannot have very much sympathy. She does not deserve compassion. A woman who allows herself to be miserable because she cannot afford fine furniture and beautiful adjuncts in the setting of her home, shows that she cares more for externals than for realities. She should ask herself on what her love rests for its foundation. If it is too slight and frail to thrive in the day of small things, it will not stand the test of greater things, if they are ever hers.

A BAZAAR IN TIFLIS

IF a proof were needed that the ends of the earth, once widely separated, are now closely interwoven, it might be found in the fact that Eastern luxury has made its way into Western home-life. Beautiful Persian rugs and draperies, in dim, rich colors, impossible to the Western loom, adorn the homes of our merchant princes, and are sometimes possessed by those who are not millionaires. An American traveler, bargaining in an Oriental bazaar, may bring home a prayer-rug or a bit of drapery that shall decorate a simple cottage in Wisconsin or Colorado.

Week-end Visits

THE phrase week-end, meaning a visit beginni on Friday afternoon or Saturday, and lasti until Monday morning, describes a present-d custom of hospitality that is beautiful and se sible. In summer, those fortunate people who dwell suburbs within easy distance of town, by train or bo often arrange to invite their friends to the country spend Sunday. This day for young men and women w are busy during the week is the only opportunity seeing green fields and gardens, and breathing pure a flower-scented and sweet.

Nothing can be more restful and refreshing than Sabbath in the country, if it be rightly spent. T church bells never sound so heaven never call with such silvern clearness worship in the sanctuary, as when they pe over orchard slopes and blue hill-tops in t morning of the hallowed day.

A Sabbath spent in quietness, in churc going, in pleasant talk in the family circ in singing around the piano and in readi friendly books, sends man and woman ba to the work of the week with new vitali and new courage. But in these times mournful change has crept into Americ life. Imitating Continental ways, peop who were brought up according to the A American ideal of keeping holy the Sa bath, now invite house parties for the wee end with the distinct understanding th there shall be bridge whist on Sunday mor ing and dancing on Sunday evening. this we have come by steps at first gradua latterly swift and fatal. A down-hill pa accelerates its own speed.

A few years ago the invasion of dinne and afternoon teas on the Sabbath sancti was regarded doubtfully or excused plau bly by those who thus allowed an enteri wedge to flaw their inherited and accu tomed tranquil Sabbath keeping. With t introduction of the motor-car into popul use, another infraction of the Sabbath h become conspicuous. It is even getting be considered antiquated and peculiar observe sacredly the Sabbath day. H not the hour come when Christians shou arouse themselves and present a stro front against the enemy who is confusi the public ideas of right and wrong? Whos ever breaks the law at one point is guil of all. If those in high places who ha money, ease, luxury and opportunity co stantly trample on the Lord's day, wh can be expected of that part of the popul tion whose lives are a bitter struggle, wh have little chance for enjoyment, and holiday but the one the Lord ordained f them in Eden?

Over against the week-end parties of th rich that violate the Sabbath, may be set contrast the incessant murmur of the sewi machine heard all day long on Sunday some parts of New York, the ceaseless ru ning of trains, the continual clash a clamor of the labor market, and the com mercial greed that makes money on th Sabbath as on the week day. Well may w ask, "What shall the end be?"

If we dare to flaunt our rebellion in th face of Jehovah, can we expect his judgment shall n sooner or later descend upon us as a nation?

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—G. W. C. A golden wedding is a happy anniversary and not ing sad should mar its festivity. Use yellow flowers, yellow ri bons and cream-colored cheese-cloth in your decorations. Th bridal pair with their children and grandchildren should rece their friends informally, and on the wall behind them it is int esting to have the dates of the two weddings, 1857-1907. JAPAN'S DEMANDS ON TURKEY

SIE WANTS RECOGNITION THERE ON THE SAME BASIS AS THE CHRISTIAN POWERS

HERE is something very interesting about the negotiations of Japan to establish an embassy at Constantinople. The Sultan may put off this recognition of the rising Asiatic nation for a ne; but diplomatists think it will eventually come. Al after all, Turkey is itself more of an Asiatic than a uropean nation.

oming up the Sea of Marmora into the Bosphorus, y see as much of Turkey in Asia as of Turkey in Eope; for while Constantinople is on European terri-t, just across is the Asiatic mainland with a group of ities. There is Kadi-Keuil, the "Village of Blind Jtice," as it is called in translating the Turkish term; Hdar Pasha, which is the beginning of the railway wch some day will spread across fertile valleys and p ns, climb the Taurus Mountains and reach the Per-si Gulf; Scutari, a steep hill city with narrow streets a a famous cemetery; and other towns of Asia Minor. But Constantinople itself is really a group of cities, a the Golden Horn with all its beauty belongs not to o section, but to the cluster which overlooks its beau-ti l waters.

The real Mohammedan city is Stamboul, with its h dreds of mosques, its great bazaar, its "sellers of v ets," its Oriental population and its exclusion of Christians. The residents of Stamboul are all Turks, o ll Mohammedans, though during the daytime many E opeans will be found mingling with the inhabitants. T e frame houses, most of them unpainted, with their l iced windows, their lacquered balconies, and their o er means of seclusion, are very characteristic. But o course Stamboul is chiefly notable for its mosques, of w ch St. Sophia's, with a grand central dome, is the r st celebrated, though to my mind it is not so fine as t Mosque of Suleiman. But St. Sophia's has memo-r s from Mecca, or is supposed to have them, and this r kes it more favored by the devout Mohammedans. I also has porphyry pillars and columns said to be f m the Temple of Diana. There are Greek crosses a l other memorials of the Byzantine era of the Chris-t n church, which have not been entirely obliterated. T e most interesting thing I have heard of in visiting St. Sophia's was not the carpets or the golden mosaics of the ceiling, but the live pigeons which were given the freedom of the upper galleries.

When Japan gets an embassy or a legation established in Turkey she will have a share in the administration of what is known as the House of the Capitulations, or International Offices. This is in Stamboul and is the headquarters of the administration of the government, in so far as foreign nations have to do with it. They cannot establish their own embassy or legation buildings in Stamboul because, as I have stated, that is reserved for Mohammedans. The only foreign legation is the Persian one, and that is permitted because Persia is a Mohammedan Power.

The embassies of the Christian Powers are established in Pera, and Pera is known as the Christian City. In it live Germans, French, Italians, English, Americans, Greeks and scores of other nationalities. On this account, any one going to Constantinople and staying all the time in Pera, would not feel as if his surroundings were very different from those of most other European cities. The Greeks are the most numerous, but there are very many French, and now the Germans are increasing rapidly.

All of the foreign governments maintain extensive residences for their diplomatic representatives. The United States has a commodious house which it rents, but this does not compare with the establishments of many of the small European Powers. However, the American embassy is quite an interesting place to visit, and since the rank of our representative was raised from that of minister to ambassador, the United States has received more consideration, and Ambassador Leishman, in looking after the interests of the American missions and schools, which he does very effectively, is enabled to treat with the Sultan on much better terms than formerly.

The most extensive diplomatic establishment is that maintained by Germany. It is a great rectangular building on a hill and commands a magnificent view. It is a couple of miles distant from the other European diplomatic residences.

Though Japan may not be classed as a Christian Power in the sense of the Christian religion being the prevailing one, in international affairs she ranks with the Christian Powers, and whenever the Sultan consents to receive an ambassador from Japan, that country undoubtedly will erect a very handsome building.

One reason why the Sultan hesitates in this matter is the knowledge that Japan would insist on receiving the same recognition that is given to the European nations and to the United States. That is, she would have all the rights pertaining to extra-territoriality, which means that Japanese subjects would not be subject to Turkish law and Turkish courts, but only to Japanese laws as administered by Japanese diplomatic and consular officials. It is possible that not many Japanese would find occasion to settle in Turkey, but the largeness or smallness of the number would have nothing to do with the principle. It is pretty well understood that the Turkish government has for years been very restless under the capitulations, or, as it is usually called, the extra-territorial status of foreigners in the Sultan's dominions.

It cannot, however, convince the Christian nations that they should abandon the exercise of this right; and it is possible that in the end the influence of these Christian nations will secure the recognition of Japan on the same basis.

There are many opinions about the present Sultan, Abdul Hamid. Some say that he is really anxious to improve the condition of his people, but that he is so hampered and bound up by the system of government and religion of which he is the head that he can do nothing. Others declare that reforms could be accomplished if the Sultan really wanted to do something. Whether he ever hears the truth would be hard to say. Certainly he would not learn it from the newspapers, because everything that is published is censored so completely that ordinary news becomes meaningless. The Sultan is familiar with several European languages, though not with English, and it is possible that he has learned something from the French or other journalists.

ted out one morning while it was yet k. Before four o'clock he came to temple where a priest was doing ple chores. A poor laboring man arrived at the same time and reverly bowed to the impotent idols.

Nearing another temple only a block two away, I heard the priestly vocifer-ns long before the building was ched. It was yet quite dark and I tured to the front door, where lights re dimly burning before the idols. ile listening to the uncanny monotone the prayers of three or four attendants, old bald-headed priest, dressed in pur- and white, came walking down the ridor from a side building, and noticing me, shouted, asking what I wanted. I motioned that I wanted to speak to him, when he disappeared. Seeing him at the entrance of another building, I walked over. After I said "Good-morning," he asked me what I wished, and pointing to my small camera, I told him I wished to take his photograph; but he quickly left me and I waited in vain for his return with the other priests to pose for a sitting. But I hoped in vain, as these city priests are suspicious of the missionaries, as our work conflicts with theirs.

At the third temple yard which I visited that morning, I found two large buildings. In each the priests were busily engaged in their morning oblations. Here they were again praying, in tones and with gestures hideous to a stranger, which we cannot get accustomed to. Were one a believer in ghosts, this would remind him of them. Now and then they made things more lively by the wizard-like sound of two sticks beating together, or by tapping a bell. In the adjoining temple they were carrying on in a similar way, only a little worse. They had two drums close to the entrance, where I could easily see a priest at each one; they were incessantly beating for an hour or so, keeping splendid time. When it seemed that they were about to stop, they renewedly called all their vim into action and beat with a little faster tempo, with energy and perseverance that reminded me of the exertions of the priests of Baal.

We came to Japan as missionaries last fall from the United States and located at Choshi. It is called the interior, although this is at the point of the cape, near which is the first lighthouse that guides American ships safely into spacious Yokohama harbor. Our place here is a city of 35,000, with villages dotting the country in every direction, and only three or four missionaries within a range of sixty miles and over.

Shall we not pray more earnestly that Christ's kingdom may soon completely overthrow all these works of darkness?

MATTHIAS KLEIN.

THE CAPTURE OF THE CITY OF JERICHO

*International Sunday School Lesson for October 20, 1907, by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE host of Israel must submit to a test of loyalty before God would permit Joshua to lead them forth to subdue the inhabitants of Canaan. Jericho was close at hand. It might have been reached in a march of two hours or less. The people must keep the Passover, which the Lord had said they must observe annually in memory of the deliverance of their firstborn from the death angel by the blood upon the door-posts and the lintels that night they were brought out of Egypt. They kept the Passover, perhaps, for the first time in forty years. And God let them know that he took pleasure in their acts of loyalty by saying that he had now "rolled away reproach" from them. Their attitude had become such that God could dare to trust them in an enemy's country.

Futile Resistance

In the meantime a wholesome fear had been spreading among the Amorites and Canaanites, because of the way in which they had entered the land on a dry path in the midst of Jordan. We are told that the people of Jericho "had straitly shut up their city" because of Israel. The gates of the city being closed, the wall round about it became one continuous fortress. Evidently Israel's host was not alarmed, because they slept soundly on the night before the attack was to be made. Joshua, however, was on the alert, and went out alone in the night to view the strongholds of the city. And there he met his Ally, the Captain of the Lord's Host, the Prince of the Host of Jehovah. At first sight Joshua mistook him for a man, and asked the question, "Art thou for us or for our adversaries?" But when the Lord declared himself, Joshua fell on his knees before him and worshiped him. And Joshua took off his shoes, because where the Lord was, there was holy ground.

Then and there Joshua received from God the plan for subduing Jericho. A procession was to be formed, consisting first of the armed host of Israel; second, a company of seven priests, in their priestly garments, blowing trumpets of rams' horns; third, a company of priests, bearing the Ark of the Covenant; fourth, the rearguard, which included all the men of Israel not belonging to previous divisions. In dignified silence this procession was to pass around the city once a day for six days, and on the seventh day they were to pass around seven times; and then, at the command of Joshua, they were to shout aloud. At this, the walls should fall, and Joshua and his host were to go in and slay the people with their swords and burn everything in the city, saving only the gold and silver, which was to be kept for use in God's house. This plan was fully and successfully carried out.

"It came to pass that when at the sound of the trumpet the people shouted, the wall fell"

The story of Jericho naturally divides into three great themes that together cover well-nigh the whole Gospel: Sin and Judgment; Repentance and Salvation; Service.

A Symphony of Faith

Sin and Judgment. How was Jericho destroyed? God used a mighty wind to fulfil his word at the Red Sea and at the Jordan, and probably an eruption in part at Sodom. Perhaps it was an earthquake at Jericho. It is not impossible that the rams' horns struck the key-note of the wall. It is well known that bridges and buildings are powerfully affected by persistent musical vibrations and by the rhythmic step of marching hosts, who on that account silence their bands and break step when crossing a bridge. At any rate, the secret of victory when we would conquer a soul or a city is in David's note, which is the key-note of Jericho: "I will sing of mercy and judgment." The real explanation is in that symphony of faith: "By faith, the walls of Jericho fell down." Whatever forces God used, the victory was one of prayer.

Surely this is the century of all others in which educated men should hesitate to deny the power of invisible forces, since science is harnessing in wireless telegraphy and storage electricity such forces as would have been regarded in Joshua's day as no less miraculous than prayer itself. Edison, the Napoleon of electric forces, once said: "No person can be brought into close contact with the mysteries of nature, or make a study of chemistry, without being convinced that there is behind it all a Supreme Intelligence." And if there is back of nature an Intelligence like ours but greater, we must reason from our own instincts as fathers and friends, that he must be in communication with us over the roads of prayer and providence. In the words of Browning:

> Would I, in my infinite longing, do all for this man,
> And think God alone shall not help him, who yet alone can?

But why was Jericho destroyed? That is quite as important as how. It is a much needed proof that God will punish sin. Jericho was near Sodom and Gomorrah, both geographically and morally. The Canaanites were not fit to live (Lev. 18: 3-25; Deut. 9: 3, 5). As God had destroyed a corrupt race by water in the days of Noah and the corrupt Cities of the Plain by fire in the days of Abraham, so in the days of Moses and Joshua he destroyed people quite as corrupt and corrupting by the swords of his people (Num. 25: 31; Deut. 9: 1-6; Josh. 6: 17, 21). The reasons and difficulties are fundamentally the same in all these cases. When we read in later chapters of the Bible how often and how deeply the few Canaanites that were spared corrupted God's chosen people by their religion of organized lust, it seems clear that the Israelites erred more in mercy than in justice. The real difficulty is that young children were slain with their parents in that age of family solidarity, such as still exists in China, where a whole family or clan is punishable for the offense of one of its members. But the children of Canaanites were fortunate to die in their innocence, rather than live to enter the hell of lust that awaited them if they lived beyond childhood. If Canaan was to become the religious school of the nations, the cancer of its licentious religion must be removed by some form of divine surgery to make it a holy land. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" men are still saying, as Abraham did of Sodom.

The God of Justice

But leaving full explanation of the harmony of "mercy and judgment" to the future, let us note as one of the clearest teachings of the Bible, that God punishes wilful sin, both of individuals and communities, both in this world and beyond. In flood and fire and war he cries to sinners and to cities: "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." The argument that because God is love he cannot punish sin, is demolished as a principle by history. Intelligent love includes law, whether in the home or in the throne of the universe. Love is not a maudlin indulgence, but includes justice. It will not spare a wilful sinner, when to do so would sacrifice the "greatest good of the greatest number," the maintenance of law and purity in the universe. As Jonathan, by arrows, symbolizing danger to be escaped, lovingly warned David to flee from Saul's wrath, so the King's Son, Incarnate Love, shoots many a warning in the Gospel and in nature and history, that clearly shows us the way of escape from the sins that will destroy us if we do not allow Christ to destroy them.

As only one family was saved at the time of the flood, so again in this day of judgment for Jericho, only one family, that of repentant Rahab, was spared. Majority rule is no doubt the best we can do in government in a wicked world, but it is not safe to follow the majority in conduct and character. In labor riots and college pranks it is often reasoned that a multitude may do wrong safely. But not so under the government of God. "Though hand join in hand till a whole city or a whole race goes wrong, judgment will not be averted by the popularity of the sin. At Jericho, Rahab and her household only were spared because she took side with Israel against her country, when her country was wrong. Let those take note who fly that private flag of the devil's making, "My Country Right or Wrong." There is a true loyalty that is not loyalty to God and right.

Loyalty to God and Right

Rahab had received the pursued spies of Israel and hidden them from her townspeople with rushes and flax, and later let them down the city wall with a rope. That she repented of the wickedness of her life* may be inferred from the fact that after Jericho's fall she married an Israelite named Salmon, and so became one of the five women named in the human genealogy of Christ (Matt. 1: 5). It is most significant that three of these, Tamar, Rahab and Bathsheba, were guilty of the scarlet sin, and yet, no doubt, saved by the scarlet thread of atonement that binds the Bible in one. The rope of the British Royal Navy is guaranteed for strength and genuineness by a scarlet thread running through it. And everywhere from the fall of Adam the Bible proclaims redemption through the blood of a substitute who dies in the sinner's stead, that the promise may be fulfilled, "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow."

It is to be hoped that the old question, "Is it ever right to lie to save life?" that is strangely debated by some as if it were a doubtful proposition, will not be allowed much of the brief time of the lesson, which should result in the capture of "Mansoul," not of our own city. In a world that God made and that God rules it can never be right to do wrong. "Right wrongs no man." Abraham twice thought he was in one of those cases where he might lie to save his life, but in both cases the lie only increased his danger, and only by the miraculous aid of the God whose law he had disobeyed did he escape. Manifestly it cannot be better to trust a lie than to trust the Lord, and so what was excusable in a heathen harlot because of her intended kindness and moral blindness ought not to be seriously urged as a rule of conduct for the twentieth Christian century. "The times of ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent."

On a small island inside the "Great Barrier Reef," North Queensland, an Englishman was engaged in gathering and curing the beche de mer, a delicacy greatly prized by the Chinese. One day this man was obliged to visit a distant town for supplies, leaving his wife and infant child with the one Chinese servant at their home. During his absence the servant come to the house in great alarm, saying that the natives had come from the mainland and were proceeding down the island toward their house. It was known that the natives were cannibals, exceedingly cruel and ferocious. The proprietor having taken the only boat, the Chinaman hastily placed a jug of water and a little food in a large copper vessel used for cooking the marine snails, assisted the woman and child into this singular bark, and paddled away to an uninhabited island three or four miles distant, where the woman and child were made as comfortable as possible. The natives reached and destroyed the little home. So long as the woman lived she kept a diary of events, among other things writing that the Chinaman would not share in the least their scanty store of food and water, and finally, after days of denial, he went off by himself, where later he was found dead, starved to death in the brush, wrapped in his old ragged quilt. Both woman and child succumbed after days and nights of privation, and all were later found, with the diary history of the little tragedy.

The official opening came the day after the first trial run. It took two cars to accommodate the officials and distinguished guests. Mr. Belmont himself acted as conductor of the first car, and he rang the "go bells" for the motorman—who for this trip was Mr. Banghardt, superintendent of motive power—to go ahead. Before the party embarked for the short journey to Long Island City, they noted one peculiar effect. They had gone down a ninety-foot shaft on the New York side, and were waiting for the car. Suddenly a breeze sprang up which developed into a small gale. They found it was caused by the approaching car driving the air before it. When they first felt the breeze the car was not more than half way over. The trip over to the Long Island terminal took but four minutes and a half. On the return trip the car came down into the tube at a sharp speed. It was going under the river like the wind when some of the party expressed a desire to see some details of the massive concrete construction. The car slowed down, but even then it made the trip in a little over four minutes.

Work on the finishing of the tunnel is being rapidly pushed and it will not be long before a regular passenger service will be in operation between New York and Long Island City; the exact date of opening, of course, has not yet been set. Work on the southern tunnel is being pushed with redoubled vigor since the success of the first has been proved.

The day before the official opening, four tests were made with one of the new cars. It went across in three and a half minutes, starting and stopping time included. It is probable that this will be the regular speed when everything is in working order. A narrow iron rail supplied the overhead electric power, instead of the copper wire used ordinarily for overhead trolleys. The cars run as easily as Pullmans and the grades are so gradual as not to be noticed by the passengers. Escalators will be installed, so that people will not have to walk up and down the ninety feet from the surface to the tunnel.

King Edward's Gift

The Bible sent by the King of England to Bruton Church, Virginia, the oldest Protestant Episcopal Church now standing in the United States, will be delivered by the Bishop of London on the occasion of its three hundreth anniversary. It bears the following inscription:

"This Bible is presented by his Majesty King Edward VII., King of Great Britain and Ireland and Emperor of India, to the Church of Bruton, Virginia, a shrine rich in venerable traditions of worship, in solemn memories of patriots and statesmen, and in historic witness of the oneness of our peoples. The King will ever hope and pray that the ties of kinship and language, and the common heritage of ordered worship and of ennobling ideals, may, through the saving faith in our Lord and Redeemer Jesus Christ, revealed in these sacred pages, continue to unite Great Britain and America in a beneficent fellowship for setting forward peace and good will among men."

There are times when even a boy should be "dressed up;" but, for every-day wear, fine clothes are out of place.

An ideal summer costume for an active youngster is this: Outing shirt, overalls, undershirt, cap, stockings and a pair of stout shoes.

Thus garbed, it makes little difference how dirty he gets, for it is always possible, by a generous application of Ivory Soap and water, to restore his hands, face and body to a state of cleanliness.

There is nothing better than Ivory Soap for that purpose. It contains no "free" (uncombined) alkali; no harmful ingredient of any kind. It is pure soap and nothing else.

A FORCEFUL EVANGELIST

ONE of the most interesting figures of the great revival movement in the Middle West is the Rev. William Sunday. Probably more people would recognize him under the name of the Rev. "Billy" Sunday, a name he prefers as savoring less of formality. Formality, Mr. Sunday believes, gets in his way and hinders work for the unchurched and the unsaved. The revival movement in the Middle States and the States of the Middle West has attained remarkable dimensions, and the end is not yet. It began several years ago, and as the interest of the people seemed to grow the movement went from community to community, and from State to State. Whole districts have, for a time, put secular affairs so far as possible aside, and given several weeks to revival work. Only such work as was absolutely necessary was done by a majority of the people, the rest of the time being spent at the revival meetings and in personal work among their friends and acquaintances.

Rev. "Billy" Sunday

No one who has watched this revival wave can doubt that much of its force and intensity is due to the tireless efforts of the energetic Mr. Sunday. To have a successful revival he believes that the field must be carefully prepared beforehand by meetings in the churches, and the organization of committees composed of the most active church workers and leading business men of the town. The latter have in many places been the hearty encouragers of the revival, subscribing funds, placing announcements in their store windows, and closing their places of business at times of special services, in order that their employees as well as themselves might attend. Before Mr. Sunday will agree to come to a town, he insists that he receive an invitation signed by all of the evangelical clergymen of the place. They must agree to close their churches during the progress of the meetings, no matter if the series lasts for several weeks. A hall must be secured large enough to hold the probable audiences, or else a tabernacle must be built. Committees must be formed and a large volunteer choir drilled. Mr. Sunday has his own choir-master, whose coming usually precedes that of Mr. Sunday, and initiates the singers into his favorite way of singing the hymns that play such an important part in a Sunday revival. A sufficient sum has to be subscribed to pay the living and traveling expenses of his co-workers and half the salary of the musical director. Mr. Sunday takes one special collection for himself, asking the people to give only as they think they have been benefited by his coming. Usually a temporary stock company is formed by the business men of the town to see that all expenses of hall, light, etc., will be met, so that the real work of the revival shall not be endangered by lack of funds. In no case has it been recorded that these men have not been paid in full.

Mr. Sunday at one time was a baseball player, one of the most famous of the "White Socks" team of ten or fifteen years ago. The hearty, free way of his earlier life yet clings to him, and has been invaluable in attracting to his meetings men who have not been to church since their parents ceased taking them there. When he first goes to a town he makes it his first step to get acquainted with the people. Of course, in his varied career, he has picked up a knowledge of a great many lines of business. He can talk with the tailor on the present price of woolens, and with the cobbler over the way the wearing qualities of leather have deteriorated since the new rush methods of tanning have been introduced. He does not bring up religion with particular emphasis at these informal talks, but always leaves with a hearty invitation to the man to come around to one of his meetings, and the man usually comes. The first meeting is usually not over large, and many of the people have come out of pure curiosity, the fame of some of Mr. Sunday's methods having preceded him. These people, in a majority of cases, come again because Mr. Sunday arouses in them a strong interest in their souls' welfare. As meeting after meeting is held, the audiences become larger, until the tabernacle will hold no more. In Iowa, during the last days of the revival, the people leaving the afternoon meetings would meet people coming in to get seats for the evening service, two hours before it was announced to commence.

Mr. Sunday follows no traditions of clerical conduct. He is Mr. Sunday and no one else. He throws himself into his work with contagious enthusiasm. As he warms to his subject the sweat trickles down his brow and he may find his coat oppressive. Off it comes, and it is laid on a chair. Later, his vest and collar may follow the coat. He walks rapidly from one end of the platform to the other and points his finger here and there among the audience, as if to seek out the unrepentant and bring him to a sense of his condition. A moment later, he sweeps in his arms, as if he would gather all into the kingdom by his own physical strength. And though many in the audience are surprised at the man and his methods, these methods have their effect, and old and young feel the strength of his energetic personality and the force of his appeal. Another thing: Mr. Sunday's converts, according to reports of ministers whose towns he has visited, when once started right, seem to "stay put." The congregations of the churches were greatly increased.

In a recent article on the man and his work, published in the American Magazine, among numerous other anecdotes, one is told of several kegs of intoxicants being sent back from a town in which he had been preaching. Under the section headed "Remarks," in the report sent by the agent to the brewery, was the following statement: "Not called for on account of the influence of the sermons of the Rev. Mr. Sunday."

d, 1907, by Jamestown Exposition

The New Government Pier at the Jamestown Exposition

H the recent dedication of the overment Pier, the Jamestown Ex- is now practically complete. The r extends from the Central Plaza e into the blue waters of Hampton as beautiful a body of water and as able a situation as our extensive it offers. A mile or so across the is Old Point Comfort and Fortress , while midway are the white ips, varying in number from week , but in their peaceful and holiday always beautiful.

waters sparkle brilliantly in the n sun; innumerable craft ply up wn constantly, including passenger reighters, sailing vessels and gov- t launches, crowded with white- middies." At night the Exposition antly lighted and shines across the ike string upon string of diamonds. stown is much less pretentious than , Buffalo or St. Louis, and visitors pect a duplicate of those mammoth are disappointed when they find ing very different. The buildings are of simple and satisfactory Ameri- hitecture and are well placed. The s are not remarkable; the "War- is not sensational; the prices are ortionate. A visitor can get a fair the whole in a day, an excellent two. After the endless distances ltitudinous exhibits of other Expositions, there is a certain relief in feeling that one has really "covered the ground."

That indefinable thing called atmosphere is extremely charming at Jamestown. Everywhere there is the soft drawl of voices, universal good nature and ready courtesy. Southern hospitality has lost none of its reputation by being displayed there. The officers have entertained, both officially and privately, in accord with the best of the "Old Dominion" traditions, while in the State Houses—which, by the way, are a very pleasant feature of the Exposition—the mothers and daughters of the States have given a ready welcome to all. The National Council of Women and several other prominent women's organizations have reception rooms and the United Daughters of the Confederacy have conducted a restaurant to the great satisfaction of lovers of old-fashioned plantation dishes.

Several months yet remain during which the effort to make the Exposition a financial success may be justified. Combined with the interesting country by which it is surrounded—Old Jamestown, on Jamestown Island, Fortress Monroe, Hampton, and Norfolk, with its combination of quaintness and metropolitan development — it makes a trip well worth taking. This effort at Jamestown is a step in the development of the New South, in the organization of its vast resources. EUPHEMIA HOLDEN.

TRANSFORMATIONS

Curious Results When Coffee Drinking Is Abandoned

It is almost as hard for an old coffee toper to quit the use of coffee as it is for a whiskey or tobacco fiend to break off, except that the coffee user can quit coffee and take up Postum without any feeling of a loss of the morning beverage, for when Postum is well boiled and served with cream, it is really better in point of flavor than most of the coffee served nowadays, and to the taste of the connoisseur it is like the flavor of fine, mild Java.

A great transformation takes place in the body within ten days or two weeks after coffee is left off and Postum used, for the reason that the poison to the nerves—caffeine—has been discontinued and in its place is taken a liquid food that contains the most powerful elements of nourishment.

It is easy to make this test and prove these statements by changing from coffee to Postum. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

GABRIELLE

THE FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE

By ISABELLA MACFARLANE

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Rebuffed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover. Again Captain Girard comes, and this time asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him her heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the de Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exception of Gabrielle escape to the ship. Gabrielle is secreted in a bale of linen, and sent in a cart to the seashore, where a boat is to meet her. She falls out, and the driver discovers he has had a Huguenot as a passenger. Gabrielle tries to escape, and is captured and taken to a convent. The nuns try to convert her. Late at night she wrenches the bars from her window and escapes to the shore. She finds a fisherman waiting with his boat. He rows her to the ship, and proves to be Captain Girard in disguise. He wishes to go with her, but she sends him back to his duty. He is arrested on his return and sent to the galleys. In the galleys he is placed next to Louis Marquand, and they become firm friends, not knowing they are rivals. They are transported as slaves to a West Indian island. After six months Girard receives news of his pardon. Meanwhile the Huguenots found New Rochelle in America. David Bonnefoy becomes a fur trader. A ship arrives bringing his cousin Dominique and David's son Raoul, who has brought with him his betrothed Rosalie and her mother, Madame Bertrand. Raoul mentions the strange disappearance of Captain Girard, and a rumor that an officer had been sent to the galleys. Gabrielle knows that the officer and Captain Girard must be the same person. Raoul and Rosalie are married in New York. Captain Girard is pardoned. He plans to go to America, taking Louis with him. He explains the plan for Louis' escape to Madame Gromartin, whose husband owns the plantation.

"WHAT is the plan?" asked Madame Gromartin.

"It is this: to disguise Louis as my negro servant, and take him on board the ship with me in that capacity."

"Excellent! Capital!" said the lady. "I am so well pleased with the plan that I shall connive with you to bring it about."

"But M. Gromartin—what will he think of it? He will lose a most efficient workman."

"Leave M. Gromartin to me," said his pretty wife, with a little toss of her head. "I shall manage to convince him, I do not doubt."

Here M. Gromartin rejoined them, and Francis, saying he wished to take a short walk before retiring, went out, leaving husband and wife together.

He made his way towards a little hut, where, on a couch of banana leaves, he and Louis had been wont to take their rest, and where Louis now lay alone, sadder and more lonely than he had felt since his first days on the galleys. Francis' supposed desertion of him had cut him deeply.

"He might have come to tell me of his good fortune, and to bid me good-by—for I suppose he will leave the island tomorrow. This was the night we were to have started on our tramp through the wilderness. I shall have to go alone now. But not to-night. I am so unstrung by—by what has happened, that I could not go to-night. But to-morrow night, perhaps. When I reach Nevis or St. Eustatius, I shall find friends to speed me on, and who knows but I may reach New York as soon as he?"

For underlying all other thoughts was the thought of Gabrielle, and the conviction that Francis, now free, would seek her out and renew his suit. It was not that he distrusted her, but the thought of another man wooing her while he himself was an exile and a slave, was torture, and all his reasoning could not prevent a throb of jealousy from agitating his brave, manly heart.

While thus pondering, he heard a step on the gravel. He raised himself on his elbow, and looking out at the open door, saw something white approaching.

A moment after, the voice of Francis said softly:

"Louis, are you asleep?"

"No, I am not asleep, Captain Girard."

"You have heard of the good fortune that has befallen me?"

"Yes, and congratulate you most heartily, Captain."

"Stop titles. To you I am, and always shall be, Francis, your friend and comrade."

Louis looked surprised. Even in the dim light he could perceive a different bearing in the other—a different ring in his voice. His tones were firmer, his manner more decided.

"I am pleased to be called your friend and comrade. I shall miss my comrade sadly in the days to come," said Louis. "Do you return to France at once?"

"I shall ultimately return to France, to my dear mother who has been so good to me. But first I shall go to North America." Louis winced. "I have an errand there. And you are going with me, Louis."

"What do you mean? I am still a prisoner, a slave."

"Yes, but I am going to set you free. Then we shall take ship together for New York, and I shall search that city and other cities, if need be, until I find Gabrielle de Bonnefoy, and then I shall make her happy by restoring to her the man she loves! Yes, Louis; I resign her to you! You may think, with your cooler blood and calmer brain, that it is a little thing to resign what one has never really possessed, but this has been to me like tearing the very heart out of my body. But it is done!" He sprang to his feet and stood erect, his arms folded on his breast. "I have made the renunciation!—It only remains for me to carry you back to her!"

"Oh, Francis! Francis!" cried Louis; "your generosity overwhelms me! But are you not taxing it too much, my comrade?"

"No. You are worthy of her. I have thought so from the moment I heard of the brave self-sacrifice that brought you to this condition."

"How did you know that?" said Louis; for, with the modesty of a truly brave man, he had never spoken of it to his companion.

"She told me," replied Francis.

The two men clasped each other's hands in a silent but heart-speaking grip. Both were much moved. Louis, the strong-hearted, was the most affected of the two, for Francis, having made the stand, had keyed himself to the pitch of manly endurance which it called for.

They sat down again on the banana leaves, and Francis unfolded his plan for getting the other away from the island, with the kind assistance of Madame Gromartin.

"Is Madame a Huguenot?" inquired Louis.

"No, you must not think all the good people are Huguenots."

"I do not think so," said Louis, emphatically.

"You will not mind acting as my servant, will you?"

ADIEU TO ST. CHRISTOPHER

MADAME GROMARTIN was as good as her word.

What arguments she had used to gain her husband's ent to the plot were unknown, but had proved successful. M. Gro-tin's part in the matter was to be ll and deaf and unconscious as to it was being done, so that, if any stigation should ensue, he could not laimed for allowing one of the gov-rnent's engagés to escape. To make vance doubly sure, he set out, early following morning, to visit another tation which he had in the interior the island.

hen Madame gave orders that Louis ild be sent to the "great house." was as favorably impressed by his earance as by that of his comrade, was therefore the more interested in deliverance.

fter a little kindly conversation with she handed him over to Francis, who him to his room, and, with a pig-t furnished by the lady, transformed face, neck and hands into those of a ro, or as good a representation of one his Caucasian features would admit. n a suit of clothes appropriate to a leman's body-servant was put on , and the transformation was com-e. It was effected with much jok-and bursts of light-hearted laugh-to both of which they had been ngers for many a day.

adame Gromartin laughed too, well sed with the result of her efforts.

ouis entered at once on his duties. uldering his "master's" trunk, he car-it to the yard, where stood a mule, whose back he was directed to strap nd seat himself beside it as best he ht.

ne of M. Gromartin's horses having n provided for Captain Girard, he ted into the saddle, delighted to find self once more on horseback. As the e was a good one, he indulged him-in a little display of horsemanship, the admiration of Madame and the ght of a crowd of house-servants.

he two young men bid adieu to the et Creole lady with the most grateful owledgments. She, on her part, e some charming words to them, and nitted them to kiss her hand—which is was almost afraid to do, lest his mplexion" should leave a spot on its whiteness.

I shall never forget your kindness, lame," said he, "and I sincerely hope M. Gromartin may not get into trouble on account of my escape."

I do not think there is much danger that. If the authorities can stop an agé from escaping, they do so; but e actually gets away, they practically 'Let him go! there are plenty of rs.'" negro boy (a real one) was assigned accompany them, in order to bring k the animals.

rrived at Basse-Terre, Francis went search of an English or Dutch ship, nd anywhere, in which he might take sage with his "servant."

Having found one, he dismissed the ro boy with a gratuity that made show his white teeth in a very wide le, and went on board at once.

CHAPTER XXIV

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST'S DAY

THE time had arrived for the first annual presentation of the "fat calf" to His Excellency Jacob Leisler, Governor of the Prov- of New York—which was to take e on the four and twentieth day of te, St. John the Baptist's Day.

Towards the purchase and maintenance of the distinguished fatling every house-holder or landowner was required to pay his portion, as well as to contribute his share to the banquet with which the occasion was to be celebrated.

The affair had been looked forward to with high anticipation and every effort was made by the heads of the village to ensure its successful accomplishment.

The banquet was to be held in the open air, temporary tables being erected in a wide space adjoining the beach.

One of the articles of food intended to furnish the feast was the Indian preparation, a clambake. As none but a native could compass that aboriginal concoction to perfection, a big Indian who went by the name of Tony (though his full name boasted three or four more syllables) was appointed to the task.

He was a man who hung about the settlement, sometimes doing a day's job, but oftener loafing about in idleness. He was in the main a peaceable fellow, but he had one fault—an inordinate love for the "fire-water." Gabrielle did not like him. In fact, she was somewhat afraid of him. As a general thing the Indians did not molest the colonists, or show themselves unfriendly to them, but this man, having come into the house one day to sell some fish he had caught, had accidentally seen Gabrielle with her abundant hair unbound. She saw his eyes glitter, and thought she heard him mutter: "Good scalp." This frightened her, and she begged that he might not be employed on this occasion. But her objections were overruled, for the occasion was an important one, and Tony was a chef, as regarded clambakes.

Attended by half-a-dozen of his own race, and as many negroes, Tony began his work early in the morning. The pit having been dug and the stones heated, he first spread on them a great bed of sea-weed, then emptied on it barrel after barrel of clams, then more seaweed, then many fowls done up in corn husks, then lobsters and crabs, sweet corn in the husk, sweet potatoes, and many other eatables—covering all with a thick coat of seaweed, and leaving it to steam and seethe until the moment, known only to himself, when the whole mass, cooked to perfection, should be opened up, ready to place on the tables.

But the Indian was not the only kind of cooking exhibited on these tables. To say nothing of the dishes essentially French supplied by the colonists themselves, the "roast beef of Old England" was represented by a lordly sirloin presented by Walter Browne, a jolly Englishman whose lands adjoined the settlement. A lady from Stockbridge, who had married a Frenchman, contributed a "pandowdy," a New England delicacy, much esteemed in its day. And a Scotchwoman, who had somehow strayed into the colony, offered a "haggis," the Scottish national dish so highly eulogized by Burns. Of this last, no one partook more largely, or relished it more highly, than Cousin Dominique de Bonnefoy, and learning that it had been made by a comely Scotch lass, who knew how to cook and how to save money, he finally resigned his bachelorhood, and married her. (But this by way of parenthesis.)

I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercise for nerves and muscles controlling such organs, bring a good circulation of warm blood which I purify by teaching correct breathing and by prescribing the special diet, bathing, etc., adapted to each individual. I strengthen all your vital organs, lungs, heart, nerve centers, and send your blood bounding through your veins as when a child.

I develop or reduce your figure to correct proportions. I teach you to stand and to walk with an ease and dignity which at once bespeak culture and refinement.

Clear Skin and a Good Figure Every figure can be rounded out symmetrically unless bones are missing or tissues entirely wasted away, and the woman who carries from 20 to 100 pounds of superfluous flesh every time she moves has my sympathy—but she does not need to do so—and surely it is every woman's privilege and duty to keep herself attractive and pleasing.

Miss Cocroft at Her Desk.

How to Stand and Walk When you request details about my lessons, I send you, Free, a booklet showing you how to stand and walk correctly, with a card of correct poise for your dressing table.

What My Pupils Say of My Work

I wish every nervous teacher could know what benefit is to be derived from your physical culture. I am writing you to-day because I have reduced exactly 100 lbs. I look 10 years younger.
My billousness is entirely relieved.
Just think how I have gained, since I began with you, from 112 to 137½ lbs. in one year.
My catarrh and lungs are much better and my body, which was a bony, crooked structure, is actually beginning to look like your picture of correct poise.
My head is steady, the confused feeling having gone. It is the best money ever spent for myself. You have made me feel like a new woman. My stomach is strong and I have had no neuralgia for some time.

Personal Instructions Write me fully, also letting me know your faults of figure, etc. I will make a personal study of your case and will let you know whether I can help you or not. Your letter will be held in strict confidence. I never publish letters without special permission, though I can send you hundreds of testimonials from women I have helped, who have given me permission to show their letters.

himself to be the God of love, and his clasp upon our hand is the only assurance of his presence that will help and save us. There are few of us who cannot call to mind moments in our life when the hand-grip of one we love has been all the world to us. It has been light out of darkness, peace out of pain, and all but life from the dead. I am not thinking of the far-off feebleness of our happy childhood, though some of us will never grow so old that we shall forget what it meant to us to put our hand in that of a big brother or strong sister or father or mother, when our little troubles sent all our poor world rocking to its foundations. But every one among us has known or will know the hour in which this handclasp is the dearest thing that mortality yet holds for us.

There are times when we have to nerve ourselves to bear physical pain. We brace ourselves with readier, steadier fortitude because of the touch of this loved hand on ours. There are times of bodily weakness, when lingering sickness has dissipated all conventional pride of manhood and womanhood, and we are little children again, clinging to the kindred weakness which is yet stronger than ourselves, and gaining comfort from such contact like a child in the dark. There are times when the overtaxed nerves give way, when streams of emotion too long held back sweep in floods over the crushed and tortured soul, when we could sob or scream—but for these same tender interlocking fingers and the calm strong current of life that flows through them and from them with peace and healing in its flow.

And this, says the prophet, is God to you—this and more than this! God, who laid the foundations of the earth when the morning stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy; God the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth; God bends from out the deep and grasps your hand in his, and whispers, "Fear not; I will help thee." O God,

Hold thou my hand:
In grief and joy, in hope and fear,
Lord, let me feel that thou art near;
Hold thou my hand!

If e'er, by doubts
Of thy good Fatherhood depressed,
I cannot find in thee my rest,
Hold thou my hand!

Hold thou my hand:
This passionate hand too quick to smite,
This hand so eager for delight,
Hold thou my hand!

And when at length,
With darkened eyes and fingers cold,
I seek some last loved hand to hold,
Hold thou my hand!

Hearing and Doing*

FROM the earliest times of religious teaching to the present, the most hopeless of all hearers has been the man who will listen, but will not act on what he hears. The greatest of all teachers was forced to utter the reproach: "Ye call me Lord, but do not the things that I say." Ezekiel could not complain of a lack of hearers, but they listened to him as to one who had a pleasant voice and could play well on an instrument; "they heard his words, but they did them not." Nor is it the religious teacher alone who has cause to complain. Thomas Carlyle, the greatest philosopher of the nineteenth century, said sadly in his old age, "Ah, they call me a great man, but they do not heed my teaching." It is so easy to listen and so hard sometimes to do. The mind is convinced and the conscience approves, but the will is inactive. The hearer listens and agrees with the teacher and knows that he ought to do as he is told, yet does not act upon his knowledge.

A hearer of that kind is in a very dangerous state. James says he is not justified; he deceives himself, which is the most fatal kind of deception. He is good in theory but practically bad. Like the man who avowed himself in favor of a law, but against its enforcement, he tries to rank with the virtuous, but in practice must be counted with the vicious. There can be no excuse for the man who knows his duty but does it not. The hearing that he has given to the truth is the basis for his own condemnation. He might have been excused, or his offense extenuated, if he had been ignorant; but being instructed, he is self-condemned. He has added disobedience to his sin. It is this kind of professor that does the greatest harm to religion. The world points to his inconsistency, to the amazing gap there is between his creed and his conduct, and draws the inference that his creed is worthless. It is, of course, a wrong inference, and most unjust to the creed; but it is common, and is one of the worst reproaches the Church has to endure.

The cause of the inconsistency is often simple indolence; the hearer will not take the trouble to put in practice what he hears and superficially believes. Sometimes it is a shrinking from public and social comment. He does not like to have his friends regard him as fanatical. Or it may be there is some secret sin or indulgence which must be given up if he follows the teaching thoroughly. Christ pictures in his parable of the king's supper some of the excuses that are made. But whatever the excuse may be the result is deplorable; the doer of the Word, and not the hearer who is not a doer, alone is justified, and is blessed in his deed.

The Saloonkeeper's Plan

SEVERAL Western journals have printed the following extract from an address by an officer of the Ohio Liquor League. It would be interesting to know who the remarkable person is who made use of such language, but the identity of the speaker seems to be kept a secret. He said:

It will appear from these facts, gentlemen, that the success of our business is dependent largely upon the creation of appetite for drink. Men who drink liquor, like others, will die, and if there is no new appetite created our counters will be empty, as will be our coffers. Our children will go hungry, or we must change our business to that of some other more remunerative.

The open field for the creation of this appetite is among the boys. After men have grown and their habits are formed, they rarely ever change in this regard. It will be needful, therefore, that missionary work be done among the boys, and I make the suggestion, gentlemen, that nickels expended in treats to the boys now will return in dollars to your tills after the appetite has been formed. Above all things, create appetite.

PREVAILING PRAYER

By Mrs. M. Baxter

UR Lord was as dependent on his Heavenly Father as we are: He did nothing, spoke nothing, but in ndence upon God. "I can of my self do nothing" (John 5: 19); "the ds that I speak unto you, I speak not myself; but the Father that dwelleth e, he doeth the works" (John 14: 10). as the deepest need of his God-man re to be in constant touch with his her in heaven, that he might live en's life down here, in a human body earth. At his baptism, when he e his disciples, in the direction he ed for every day, at the time of his sfiguration, at the grave of Lazaru in Gethsemane, on the cross—Jesus ed.

And it came to pass as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one his disciples said to him, Lord, teach o pray, as John also taught his disles." They saw in the life of their ter and Lord what they saw in no r: a power and a presence which was of earth. They saw how the power Satan fled before him, and the only anation to them was his constant t of prayer. They had seen the Prisees "standing in the synagogues, in the corners of the streets, that might be seen of men" to pray; but such results followed those prayers; were of quite another order; and deep longing of the disciples' hearts to learn to pray as Jesus prayed. re are many of God's children who been in the habit of praying, and ying much and earnestly for many rs; but those who have most prayed those who pray the most earnestly : "Lord, teach us to pray."

nd a second time the Saviour put into r lips the prayer which he had already ght them on the mountain. But in d of this time prefacing it by the ds, "After this manner therefore pray making it the model of all prayer, instead of, as in Matt. 6, adding to s on that occasion, the solemn warnto those who do not forgive (compare tt. 6: 9, 14, 15), both the preface and appendix are different. "When ye y, say." Not only let your every yer put God first, as in this prayer; only in this way seek first the kingn of God and his righteousness, but these words which I, your Master, in common with you. "Our Father." rs and mine. "Which art in heaven." u and I both have a heavenly parent, born from above; without which h no man can see the kingdom of God ohn 3: 3).

Our Father. If he lets us thus into lowship with him as Man, sons of a mmon Father, he would teach us felship with his heart's desire: "Halled be thy name, thy kingdom come, will be done." The very first desire, ruling passion of our Lord, was to or and hallow, by his every word, and every deed, the name and character his Father, whose express image he ne on earth to be. If he lets us into h "fellowship with the Father and h his Son Jesus Christ" (I. John 1: 3), at a lovely thing it is to pray in eness with our Lord: "Hallowed be name!" What a denial to our prayer l his it is, if we can remain sensitive longer to our own name, and be eved and hurt if people do not give us at we think is our due, of love, respect, consideration!

And his heart's desire is, "Thy kingm come"; he refused and shrank from ng made a king, until he had first be- me a Saviour on the Cross. But he ll come again to be a King; and we n pray for the time to come when "the gdoms of this world shall become the gdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ" ev. 11: 15). But to this end we pray fellowship with him that all which has en usurped by Satan, in the world and our own being, may be conquered, and y become his, whose purchased right is. And we can pray: "Thy will be ne on earth, as it is done in the high- t heaven," the very throne of God: done in our hearts and lives, in our homes, and in our work, in our spirit, soul and body: that in all nothing may be out of harmony with him, as he our Lord sought on earth, what he came down from heaven for, that the will of God may be done.

Was there not also fellowship with his disciples when Jesus taught them to pray: "Give us this day our daily bread"? When he took the five loaves in his hands, and gave thanks, was it not a reality? Did he not really take the food for his body at his Father's hand, and, as the great Sin-bearer, is there not a wonderful fellowship with us? As we sinners look up to God, and say: "Forgive us our sins," is he not ever living to make intercession for us, coming in person to the Father with the sinners he died for? Does he not come with the "much incense" of his precious blood, so that the smoke of the incense which comes with the prayers of the saints ascends up before God out of "his priestly hand"?

And having "suffered being tempted," does he not accompany the prayer of the tempted one who cries: "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil"? Can anyone enter into the shame and suffering of temptation as he can, who fasted forty days and forty nights when he overcame the wicked one, that a way might be made for us also to overcome? He only is able to "succor them that are tempted."

The Bethesda Lepers

Mr. R. D. Wolterbeek, of Nos. 1 and 3 Ann Street, New York City, sends an appeal for contributions of linen bandages for the Bethesda Leper Home in Surinam. He writes: "Rev. Mr. Bernhard, manager of the Leper Home in the absence of the Rev. Mr. Weiss, writes me that they are again entirely out of bandages, and this means that they will have to resort to washing the old bandages and using them over again, unless we can send them some more old linen at once. If your good people would open their old linen closets, find a few cast-off pieces of old linen and send them prepaid to this office, I shall be glad to reforward them to the Bethesda Leper Home, as heretofore."

FOOD STOPPED IT

Good Food Worth More than a Gold Mine

To find a food that will put an absolute stop to "running down" is better than finding a gold mine.

Many people when they begin to run down go from one thing to another without finding a food that will stop the progress of disease. Grape-Nuts is the most nourishing food known and will set one right if that is possible.

The experience of a Louisiana lady may be interesting. "I received a severe nervous shock some years ago and from that and overwork gradually broke down. My food did not agree with me and I lost flesh rapidly. I changed from one kind of food to another but was unable to stop the loss of flesh and strength.

"I do not exaggerate when I say that I finally became, in reality, a living skeleton. My nights were sleepless and I was compelled to take opiates in various forms. After trying all sorts of food without success I finally got down to toasted bread with a little butter, and after a while this began to sour and I could not digest it. Then I took to toasted crackers and lived on them for several weeks, but kept getting weaker.

"One day Grape-Nuts was suggested and it seemed to me from the description that it was just the sort of food I could digest. I began by eating a small portion, gradually increasing the amount each day.

"My improvement began at once, for it afforded me the nourishment that I had been starving for. No more harassing pains and indigestion. For a month I ate nothing but Grape-Nuts and a little cream, then I got so well I could take on other kinds of food. I gained flesh rapidly, and now I am in better health than I have been in years. I still stick to Grape-Nuts because I like the food and I know of its powerful nourishing properties. My physician says that my whole trouble was a lack of power to digest food, and that no other food that he knows of would have brought me out of the trouble except Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason."

Gold Dust

is the world's greatest cleaner for here, there and everywhere about the house. It goes after dirt with a "big stick," and does all cleaning quicker, cheaper and more thoroughly than any other cleanser. It cuts dirt and grease like magic, cleanses, purifies and sterilizes everything it touches, and shortens all household cleaning by half.

If you want to escape the old-fashioned arm-paining, back-straining grind of housework, GOLD DUST will point the way.

No soap, borax, soda, ammonia, naphtha, kerosene or other foreign ingredient needed with GOLD DUST

For washing dishes, scrubbing floors, cleaning woodwork, oilcloth, silverware and tinware, polishing brasswork, cleaning bathroom pipes, refrigerators, etc., softening hard water, washing clothes, and making the finest soft soap—

"Let the GOLD DUST Twins do your work"

Fairy Soap

You should avoid the use of toilet soaps containing coloring matter and high perfumes, because they are usually used to disguise cheap materials. A pure white soap is best of all. FAIRY SOAP is the only white floating soap which contains the highest grade of edible beef fats and the choicest cocoanut oil. It contains no strong alkali to dry up and irritate the skin and destroy its natural softness.

Compare the whiteness of FAIRY SOAP with the yellowish tinge of other so-called white toilet soaps; compare the deliciously sweet, clean odor of FAIRY SOAP with the greasy, "soapy" smell of other soaps.

FAIRY SOAP is the best toilet and bath soap you can buy, regardless of price—yet it sells for 5c a cake.

FAIRY SOAP was granted highest possible awards at both St. Louis and Portland Expositions

Sunny Monday

possesses virtues never before introduced in a laundry soap. Its extraordinary dirt-starting qualities will save rubbing, time, and wear and tear on clothes.

SUNNY MONDAY LAUNDRY SOAP *(n.r.) contains not an ounce of rosin, making it specially valuable for the washing of woolens, flannels and the finest fabrics, without shrinking. All yellow laundry soaps contain rosin, which is most destructive to fine fabrics and woolen garments, since it causes the fibers to harden, eventually shrinking and ruining the fabrics.

SUNNY MONDAY LAUNDRY SOAP *(n.r.) has all the virtues claimed for naphtha soap, and will do better work. Naphtha evaporates when exposed to the air or put in hot water, hence its inefficiency; in SUNNY MONDAY LAUNDRY SOAP *(n.r.) the ingredients last until the cake is worn to a wafer.

*N.R. means "No Rosin." SUNNY MONDAY Laundry Soap contains no rosin. Rosin is an adulterant and will rot and ruin clothes. Because it is all soap, one bar of SUNNY MONDAY will do the work of two bars of any other laundry soap.

LAND OF PAGODAS AND PAGEANTS

: : : Festival Time at Mandalay, and How Its Spectacular Events Strike a Stranger : : :

THE Burmese are a light-hearted and pleasure-loving race, but they are also callous to human suffering. When committed to an outcast life, as dacoits, or when aroused by jealousy or hate, they are cruel and bloodthirsty to the last degree. Thus we find instances of peasants who had offended a robber nd being caught and crucified, whilst raids in which mutilation was as frequent as urder used to be by no means uncommon.

The extension of British rule, not only to northern Burma, but also to the Shan ates and the mountain tribes the border lands, has brought out a better state of things, ough violent crime still figures rgely in the police records. The eat heat on the one hand, and the other the smallness of the pulation and the ease with ich a sustenance may be obined from the rich soil, have ntributed to make the Burman lazy individual. He smokes d watches others work.

Women occupy a much freer sition in Burma than anyhere else in Asia, except perps in Tibet and Bhutan. It the women who do much of e work, and almost all the mart trading. One of the photoaphs shows two middle-class rls in everyday costume, and a dy in full gala dress. She wears e "tamaing," or open skirt. his dress was promoted, and rhaps initiated, by one of the urmah kings, but it is now disuraged by the British governent to wear it in public.

Brilliant reds, greens, and yelws predominate in the dress both men and women. Many the bright silks and cottons worn in Burma are woven in England and France. In sharp contrast to these Burmese girls are two women of the northern Shans; e latter wearing the fine colored and richly embroidered skirts which the maidens the race prepare with great labor for the time of their marriage. The groundork of the dress is black, as is also the wonderful turban, a headdress which none ut a Shan woman could wind. Both Burmese and Shan men and women make reat holes in the lobe of the ear. Sometimes a section of bamboo as wide as a nall napkin ring is worn in the ear-lobe by the men of the southern Shan tribes.

A "Phongyi Byan" or Priest-burning Procession in Mandalay

For the most part, the Burmese bury their dead in the ground, or rather on the surface, and then build a mound of earth over the coffin. All who can afford to do so have a small pagoda built over the remains. This is a votive offering to Buddha, and is supposed to react in favor of the deceased. The members of the Buddhist priesthood—or at least the more exalted among them—are not buried, but are burnt amid very elaborate and costly ceremonies. In one case, witnessed by the writer, the old priest, or "phongyi," had been dead more than a year, and his body had been preserved in honey!

One of our photographs represents the procession at a "phongyi byan," or priest burning, in Mandalay. The bullock carts carrying banners go in front; then come the priests and acolytes, carrying Chinese paper umbrellas. These are followed by a boat upon wheels, and this again by the pagoda-shaped erection which forms the funeral pyre. Chinese and Hindoos, as well as Burmese, attend. The low-lying character of the land in Mandalay is shown by the embankment on which onlookers are standing. The boat is a real boat, with living oarsmen, but it is used symbolically in the ceremonies.

In another photograph is shown the beautifully decorated bamboo-and-paper pagoda which encloses the body of the dead priest. The pictured panels set forth heroic scenes from Buddhist legend. Arrived at the place of burning, a young lad—perhaps the son or grandson of the wealthy patron who has provided the funeral—will apply a torch, and soon the whole will be one mass of flames. To their honor be it said, the Burmese never practised suttee, nor do they know aught of the horrors of child widowhood.

It may interest your readers to learn that the state barge formerly used by King Thebaw is in the form of a "zayat," or rest house, built upon twin boats, and with some kind of protecting divinities as figure-heads. It is a picturesque reminder of that monarch, whose cruelties marked his reign as one of the worst ever known.

The Gospel Army

TEXT—Solomon's Song 6: 10

"Terrible as an army with banners"

ONE of the easiest characteristics to develop is a genius for looking upon the dark side of life. If the human soul will persist in dwelling in the dark caverns by day, it will not be very long before it will go forth to seek its food by night. Then it will think that all human beings have the depraved nature of the bat and the coyote. Then it will get the awful habit of looking for the imperfections in the lives of men rather than for their virtues and their excellencies.

People who rejoice in the weaknesses of their neighbors are apt to glory in the imperfections of any notable movement of the day. They love to magnify social troubles. They love to detect the dark clouds in the political, moral and financial horizons. They love to be eulogists of the past and depreciators of the present. They contend that all the great men are dead, and that the living men are a feeble, puny, worthless race. They seem to be blinded to the self-evident facts of the world's progress on every side. They are like the foolish man who stands upon the seashore and watches the incoming tide. A wave rears and breaks and flings itself upon the beach and then recedes into the ocean. "There! There!" he cries. "See, the tide is going out!" Then another wave rears and plunges and comes up a little higher upon the beach and then recedes. "There, there!" he cries again. "The tide is going out." The pessimists seem to be blinded to the fact that each wave comes up a little higher and a little higher, until, after a while, full tide is reached and the whole seashore is flooded with the heaving waters. Now, this is just what some pessimists do when they watch the incoming tides of the world's prosperity and progress. They see here and there a wave break and go back. They see here and there a man or an institution fail. Then they cry, "Look! look! See how the world is going to the dogs!" But, though here and there we may see a receding wave, the general trend is higher and better.

Pessimistic Predictions

Pessimists hurl their strictures in all directions, but their favorite target is the Church. "Aha," they laugh; "did you ever see an institution crumble into pieces like the old Church? The children of this day are not being sent to the Sunday Schools as they once were. Just look how empty are its pews—here and there an old woman or a sickly, effeminate man attending the church service; but for the most part sensible people look upon Sunday as a holiday, instead of a holy day. Once the Bible was the most conspicuous book upon the parlor table; now the stock quotations of the daily newspapers have taken its place. Once the minister was looked upon as the most important personage in a community; now the actor is the idol of the young people. Once the schoolhouse was a coadjutor of the Church; now it has broken its shackles of bondage and the public authorities refuse to allow a Bible chapter to be read in the public school. Everywhere we see the Church as a public institution receding and crumbling and disappearing." So say the pessimists, who are hurling their anathemas at the Church.

Now, I would not have you think that the Church which Christ established is a dying Church. I shall show you that the Church of God is, by its nature, a conquering Church; that the Gospel is growing stronger and purer and more powerful every day; that the prophetic vision which King Solomon saw three thousand years ago is being fulfilled now. The Church to-day, like a bride, is preparing for the advent of the Divine Bridegroom. She is going forth to perform the work which God has given her to do, "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

The prophetic vision of my text likened the conquering Church to a great army in numbers. It likened it to a mighty multitude which marched by, company after company, regiment after regiment, brigade after brigade, division after division, host after host. There the army went marching, tramping. And as they marched and kept step, the very earth trembled and shook with the uniform tread of the myriads of feet.

You know that when soldiers come to a bridge, they are ordered to break step lest the rhythmic pulsation of the marching bring down the bridge. But in the scene of my text, the conquering Church will never have to break step. Its myriads of Christian soldiers will march until the poundings of their many feet will make the earth shake with the step of the advancing hosts. The figure in this metaphor is not that of a "corporal's guard." It is not the figure of a small company. But it is the figure of a great warlike host upon the march. "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"

Oh, the immensity of the army of the Gospel Church! Some of you aged men and women were in Washington during the grand parade of the Union troops, just before they disbanded after the Civil War. Hour after hour the returning soldiers filed past that reviewing stand. But the Christian army is greater in numbers than any that ever followed a Grant, a Sherman, or a Lee. You may have read about the great host which Xerxes organized for his invasion of Greece. When the Asiatic general approached the Hellespont, he had in his ranks over a million fighting men. But the Gospel Army is larger than that. The finest military organization to-day is that commanded by the German Kaiser. On its peace footing, Germany has to-day an army of nearly a million men. Then it has two great reserve corps, the Landwehr and the Landsturm. That means that every able-bodied man in the German Empire is part of

The Nucleus of a Regiment

Each man has his place. At the call to arms, all the men from the farm, the counter and the office repair to their mobilizing stations. There the uniforms and the guns await them. Each horse and saddle in the empire is numbered. And at a given signal, every able-bodied man from twenty to sixty can be swung to the frontier for defensive or offensive purposes. But the Gospel Army is larger than that of the combined armies of the German Empire.

The Gospel Army is not limited to any one nation. It is not restricted, as other armies are, to one sex. It is not decreased by the limitation of age. Old men belong to it. Children belong to it. Husbands and wives and brothers and sisters belong to it. White and red and black and yellow-skinned races, all belong to it. This army is made up of all kinds of people of all churches. And yet, strange to say, there are some mistaken men and women who think the Gospel Church is not an army at all. They suppose it is a mere aggregation of a few "corporal guards," whereas it is numerically greater than all the combined armies of England and Germany and France and Italy and Austria and Russia and Japan and China put together. If we could only get all Christians to form into line and march side by side, and keep step, the pounding of their united feet would make this old earth tremble. Great! Great! Infinitely great is the Gospel Army!

That the host is a mighty one is demonstrated by the marvelous statistics of missions, both home and foreign. It was only a few years ago comparatively that William Carey died. He died in 1834. Yet up to his time but little was being done for the salvation of the outside world. It was only in the beginning of the last century that five humble students met behind a haystack in Williamstown, Mass., to form the American Foreign Missionary Society. Yet there are to-day 28,386 mission stations in heathen lands. There are organized thousands of churches among the nations groping about in idol worship. And there is not a strategic point in any island, or upon any continent which to-day has not a Gospel missionary preaching there. Study to-day your muster rolls of the Christian Endeavor Societies and your Brotherhoods of Andrew and Philip and your Epworth Leagues.

Study Your Enrolment

of denominational churches. How the number swells! Larger and larger it grows. Like St. John in his vision of the other world, we can cry as we see this Gospel Army marching, "After this, I beheld, and lo, a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands, and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." The first great fact which ought to impress us as to the Church Army of Jesus Christ is the infinite numbers of its marching soldiers.

Next to the vastness of this army of the Church of God I am impressed with the banners which are fluttering over it. You know that what the military uniform is to the soldier as an individual, the flag or banner is to the army as a whole. It is the sign by which the soldiers of one nation are distinguished from the soldiers of another nation. Because our own beloved American flag represents so much, you always find it the most honored emblem in the camp or in the field. I was never more impressed with this fact than some time ago, when I went to the Presidio, or army quarter of San Francisco. I went there with a very important message to the commandant of the post, Colonel Lundeen, from the Commanding General of the Coast, Lieutenant-General McArthur. Suddenly, while I was talking to the Colonel, the sunset gun was fired and the post flag began to flutter down. At once Colonel Lundeen stopped talking to me and faced about and stood at attention before those falling colors. Not one word would he speak until the ceremony of lowering the flag was ended.

The flag, the American flag, means so much. It is the protecting emblem of our national government. In time of battle it is the great rallying point for our soldiers. Where the flag goes, our soldiers always follow. When the flag goes down, confusion reigns; hence one of the most dangerous, yet most honored posts in the army, is that of a color-guardsman. So precious are the regimental colors that they are always surrounded by the best and the bravest soldiers when the regiment is in the field.

Now it is appropriate for the Gospel Army to have a flag like any other army. What kind of a banner is floating over this great army of the Church? There is only one flag, and that is the banner of the Cross. Whatever you do, wherever you go, there in the Gospel Army you can always find

The Banner of the Cross

As in other organized armies there are in the Gospel forces different regiments which are called denominations. There is the Episcopalian regiment, the Baptist regiment, the Presbyterian regiment, the Lutheran regiment, the Congregational regiment and the Methodist regiment. Every regiment has its own denominational flag carried alongside of the flag of the Cross. Is it not a glorious thought that as the years go on there is an increasing tendency to throw away our sectarian flags and lift higher and higher the blood-red flag of the atoning Cross of Jesus Christ?

But there is another fact about this Gospel Army that I wish to emphasize. It is an advancing army, a conquering army, an army upon the offensive. But it is also an army that is more and more becoming possessed of purer and holier ideals. The nearer the time approaches when the church, as a bride, is to place her hand in that of the divine Bridegroom, the more carefully she arrays herself in the pure white robes that are to be her wedding garments. How different is man's idea of purity from the divine standard!

Dr. F. B. Meyer, the great English preacher, taught this truth in a simple way. He was making a pastoral call upon one of his church members, who was a washerwoman. She was one of the most devoted Christians, and one of the saintliest characters in his church. Like all good Christian washerwomen, she did her work as conscientiously at the tub as at the prayer meeting. Her clean linen was hanging upon the lines and lying around drying when the preacher called. "What beautiful clean linen you have!" said her pastor. "Yes," answered the woman, "if God wants me to be a washerwoman I must make the clothes white for his glory just as I pray well for his glory." But during Dr. Meyer's visit, the snowflakes began to fall. When he came to the door to say "Good-bye," the white mantle of winter was everywhere. But the snow was so white now that it made the linen clothes grimy in comparison. Then Dr. Meyer said, "Oh, madam, your clothes do not look as clean now as they did!" "Of course not," replied the woman. "Remember, God's white is always purer than man's white." So the nearer the Church comes to union with Christ, the nearer the time for the wedding nuptials, the more the Church is being cleansed, and the higher and purer become its ideals. Then the more its wedding garments take upon themselves the purity and spotlessness of God's whiteness and God's love.

Influence on the World

To hear some pessimists talk, one would suppose that not only numerically, but also in purity and ideals, the Church is rapidly deteriorating. I contend that not only is the Church growing better, but it is influencing the whole world and elevating its ideals. Social conditions which would not now be tolerated for a day were formerly ordinary commonplaces. We talk about the curse of "tainted money" in these days. We say that the American people are lost to all sense of honor and decency, when corporation funds are accepted by political parties. We say that the juggling of stocks in Wall Street is an outrage. We say that the State legislatures are only puppets of the monopolies and that the municipal councils are owned, body and mind and soul, by the railroad corporations. But stop!

THE VACATION BIBLE SCHOOLS

WHAT THEY HAVE ACCOMPLISHED EAST, SOUTH AND WEST THE PAST SUMMER

By REV. E. B. SANFORD, D.D.

THE long summer vacation, when the public schools are closed, is a time of demoralizing influence to multitudes of boys and girls who are compelled to remain in the cities. Vacation ble Schools not only promise to help in changing se conditions, but also afford the means through ich many children whose lives are seldom touched by churches receive religious instruction. The method these schools, like most effective agencies, is very ple, but far-reaching in influence.

The Rev. R. G. Boville instituted this work in New rk in 1901. Under his direction, this plan was taken by the City Federation, and has proved very successful. Last spring the National Federation of Churches inted Mr. Boville National Director of the Daily cation Bible Schools, thus securing under his efficient dership the extension of this movement in the other at cities of the United States. The report of the rk during the past summer is most encouraging. The ools opened in Chicago and Philadelphia were ecially successful.

In Chicago, under the auspices of the Church deration Council which was organized in that city t year, the local committee opened four schools: two the stock-yards district (in the Union Avenue Presbyian Church and the Halsted Street Methodist Institutnal Church), and two others in equally needy centres ere children abound.

The report of Mr. Boville tells us that the schools in icago were opened on July 15 after two days of prenary training, and were under the supervision of Rev. Charles H. Rominger, who brought not y personal experience but a Moravian devotion to work.

The programme of these schools was the same as that carried out in Philadelphia. There were the same Bible stories, there was the same music and manual instruction, the same flag hung over the outside door, the same curious mixture of children with foreign names was present, many of whom had never been inside a Sunday School. The same race antagonisms cropped up. "Hattie and Minnie now speak to the little Levinskys," was the comforting report of a teacher at one of the weekly conferences. Here, as elsewhere, the proportion of boys of twelve to fourteen years of age was remarkable.

The Philadelphia Committee, of which Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tompkins was chairman, decided to select the populous manufacturing district of Kingston for the location of four schools, in churches of the Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Lutheran communions. An earnest student staff of twelve men and women was carefully sought out from Bryn Mawr College and the Universities of Pennsylvania and Bucknell. After careful investigation and conference with the National Director, the chairman of the Evangelistic Committee of the Presbyterian Church, the Rev. C. A. R. Janvier, and his committee, unanimously decided to open four of its tents and buildings for Vacation Bible Schools, equipping them from the large staff of Princeton students available, and adopting the Federation programme. The Baptist City Mission fell into line in its plans, and, the movement having gathered momentum, three Baptist churches and one tent were also opened on July 8, for Vacation Bible Schools. The student staffs of the various committees joined together in the preliminary training exercises, as afterwards in the regular weekly conferences. Thus, in all, twelve church buildings and tents were opened to children for five mornings weekly, during July and August, with the same programme and methods —one hour of Bible instruction and music, and one hour of manual work and games—and with the same recognition of the peculiar fitness of wide-awake college men and women to win and hold the children.

A statement about National Vacation Bible Schools would be incomplete without due recognition of the schools conducted by individual churches and local Federations. The First Presbyterian Church of Irvington-on-Hudson has conducted a Vacation Bible School during the past season, and the Federation of Churches has caused one of the churches of Providence to be opened for this work. In New York City nine schools were open during July and August under the direction of the Baptist City Mission Society, and fifteen under that of the local Federation of Churches. Both of these societies co-operated in the training of the staffs and the superintendence of the schools.

With forty-five schools conducted during the past summer in five cities and over 140 students engaged in the work, with the national committee in the field to extend the movement in the large cities as the most effective form of city mission summer work, with plans being considered to reach such cities as Boston, Baltimore, St. Louis and Pittsburg, the Daily Vacation Bible Schools may now be considered a permanent institution through which the Christian colleges of the land may minister during the midsummer vacation to vast multitudes of children in the great cities, who are as sheep without a shepherd.

d you ever consider the fact that the reason we hear much about the financial dishonesties of life is beuse the public conscience is being aroused and a gher standard of morals has been established? Furrmore, did you ever stop to consider that criminal ancial dealings which, two centuries ago, were looked on as the ordinary and usual ways of doing things, uld not be tolerated now for one moment? Did you r hear that one of the first buildings that were cted upon the campus of Princeton College, the dquarters of Presbyterianism, was erected by the ney raised in a public lottery? Don't talk to me out the world growing worse! Why, if some of our eat-grandfathers and grandmothers should rise up m their graves and start to live as they used to do, y would be ostracized from respectable society and would have nothing to do with them.

But there is another fact which I want to emphasize out this conquering army of the Gospel Church: at is, it may win its final conquest any hour. The ne may be at hand this century, this decade, this ar, this month, when Christ is going to come and ablish his universal kingdom upon the earth. For g years and generations, the prophets of old fored his birth in Bethlehem of Judea. But the people d waited for Jesus so long that they became indiffert, and when he did come, they were completely taken surprise. In the New Testament, we have again d again the promise that Christ is going to come a ond time and establish his kingdom through the urch. We, too, have waited so long for the second vent of Christ that many of us are apt to think he can not come during our lifetime. Yet there has never been a generation since he left the earth that was so ready as this to welcome him, nor has there ever been a time so suited as this for the fulfilment of the prophecy of Christ's second advent.

Now, if this great army of the Gospel Church is capturing the world for Christ, and if the second advent of Jesus may take place at any moment, does it not become our duty to join the Gospel battalions, and have a part in that glorious day when all earth and all heaven shall unite in celebrating the dominion of Christ from sea to sea? Shall not we do something for Christ's glory now, so that we may have the right to share in his spiritual triumph? Is it not about time for some of us to give up living our mean, selfish, sordid lives of sinful indulgence, and to join the great Gospel host of those who are working and waiting for the millennial dawn? Can we, dare we, afford to waste even a day or an hour in idleness, when there is still work to be done which may bring nearer this divine consummation?

It is said that when the distinguished Dr. Backus, the late President of Hamilton College, was dying, the doctors told him he had but thirty minutes to live. "Only thirty minutes?" he said. "Well, as the time is so short, then get me down on my knees that I may spend the last half hour of my earthly life in praying to my God for the salvation of the world and for the establishment of his kingdom on earth." So may we pray and work and live that the time may soon come when Christ shall appear and establish his kingdom on earth as it is in heaven.

And oh, when that glorious day comes, what blessed rewards there will be! As the great Church army marches past, there will be a badge of Christ's Legion of Honor for every faithful one, no matter how poor or how weak that one may be. After the Crimean War, there was a great celebration in London when Queen Victoria, with the Prince Consort by her side, gave out medals to the heroes. Some soldiers came with empty sleeves, some on crutches, some with bandaged foreheads; but there was the same sweet, royal smile and the same reward for all. At last there was carried up to the beloved Queen a poor wreck of humanity on a litter. Both of his arms and both of his legs were gone. He was only a common soldier; but in the service of his country he had done his best. Then the revered Queen, with tears streaming down her cheeks, went to the litter and pinned a badge upon the poor fellow's breast and kissed his brow and said, "Well done, good and faithful servant!" So on that great day of the triumph of Christ's kingdom upon earth, some of the humblest soldiers are to get Christ's rewards.

Would you not be that humble Christian soldier, O man, O woman? Can you not see the white horse of victory with the King riding down the heavens? Can you not hear the tramp of his conquering hosts? O man, are you ready to welcome your King as a true, brave, self-sacrificing, faithful soldier of his army? "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?" It is the Church; it is Christ's conquering army. Have you a place in the ranks?

Episcopalians in Historic Convention

DEEPLY interesting to the whole Church of Christ throughout the Union is the Convention that assembled in Richmond, Va., on October 2. It was the Forty-fourth Triennial Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church and was also the tercentenary celebration of the establishment of that Church on American soil. Thirteen years before the Pilgrim Fathers set foot on Plymouth Rock the Church of England had been planted on this side of the Atlantic and its sacraments solemnly administered. The Englishmen who came here to organize the Virginia colony were loyal not only to the Crown but to His Majesty James I., as Head of the Church by law established.

Bishop Tuttle of Missouri — Bishop of St. Albans — Bishop of London — Bishop Montgomery — Bishop Gibson of Virginia

Unlike the Pilgrim Fathers, to whom episcopacy was an abomination, the Virginia colonists professed a hearty love for the English Church and a sincere attachment to its ordinances. The offshoot they planted grew in dependence on its parent stem, for nearly two centuries providing for the English immigrant and his descendants a form of worship hallowed by home associations. Then came the political convulsion which rendered continued dependence impossible. It speaks volumes for the fidelity and patriotism of the saintly men who had charge of the destinies of the Church at that time that the offshoot was separated from the parent stem so skilfully and tenderly that it took root in American soil and has survived in increasing virility to this day. Had they not been wisely guided there could not now be a Convention celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of the establishment in this country of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The Convention is notable, too, for the visitors who have come to attend it. Three of these are especially conspicuous. Bishop Jacobs of St. Albans is a man of high position in the English Church. Bishop Montgomery is the secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which is the oldest missionary society in Great Britain, antedating the Church Missionary Society. It has been in existence since 1701, and was unremitting in its efforts to evangelize America in the early colonial days. That its secretary has come over here to attend the Convention indicates its missionary purpose and character. But the most significant and distinguished visitor is the Right Rev. A. F. Winnington-Ingram, Bishop of London. It is a curious fact that the whole Church of England in America formed part of the Diocese of London before the Revolution. The Bishop, therefore, has a fatherly interest in the condition of this scion of his episcopal house.

In the early days of the Church after the Revolutionary War, the parent Church was reluctant to grant its offspring the privileges it required. A bishop was needed to ordain clergymen, but the English Church was averse to consecrating such a prelate, preferring that clergymen should go to England to be ordained. Dr. Seabury, who went to England as the clergyman whom his brethren in Connecticut deemed most suitable for the office of bishop, was coldly received, and eventually had to be content with consecration at the hands of Scotch bishops. It was not until 1787 that Dr. William White and Dr. Samuel Provoost were formally consecrated respectively Bishops of Pennsylvania and New York. Now the Bishop finds here a great church of six hundred thousand communicants, with five thousand clergymen and more than a hundred living bishops. Such progress has the Church made since Rev. Robert Hunt held the first service on Sunday, May 17, 16 under the spreading branches of the trees of the prir val forest.

St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., in Which Some of the Sessions Are Held

Already in former issues some account has been giv of this genial prelate, whose work in London has be so wonderful blessed. Here has spoken m fully words of w dom and warni In the very first s sion of the Conv tion, in the cou of the sermon preached, he sai

I am convinced t the characteristies the Church wh would possess the ture are: First, doubtedly, that should believe preach the forthrea ing, energizing and tive love of God; ond, that with Gospel of the love God must go what call in England message of a free salvation. I have no means of knowing, d brothers, the trend of religious thought in the United States: from my experience of east, north and west London, the fut lies with no church which sinks to what is called the New The ogy. God forbid we should say a word against any individ man who believes as much as he can of the Christian creed; what we must beware of on both sides of the Atlantic is losing power of our message by trying to make easier to be believed.

But, after all is said and done, the m evangelistic, the most catholic, the most thodox church on earth will produce no eff upon the world if it has not still one furt characteristic. It must clearly and unm takably and before all the world be worldly itself. The mustard seed is plan in the earth, but it will never grow and pand and flourish without the light and of heaven. Bear with me, then, when I as my last word, that the greatest dange the Church on both sides of the Atlanti worldliness.

In one sense it is impossible for the Chu to mix too freely with the world. Into slums of East London, into the busines Wall Street, into the mining camps of Klondike, the Church must go, and no hum interest in the world is outside the inte of the Church.

But, on the other hand, to run a churc a man runs a successful business, to dep upon cleverness and management rather t the grace of God, to neglect prayer and in cession in favor of influence with the pr to lower the teaching of the Church or moral standard in order to suit a self-in gent age, is to spell ruin and failure shame for the most orthodox church in world. In a voice which still rings de the centuries, Jesus Christ himself claimed, "My kingdom is not of this worl

Evangelism in Newcastle, Pa.

DURING the past year, the ministers and other Christian workers of Newcastle, Pa., have in their judgment deemed it wise for the churches to unite for concerted evangelistic effort. Moved by the news of the great revivals held in this and in other countries, and especially of those conducted in our large cities by the Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and his associates, it was finally decided to invite this noted evangelist to take charge of a simultaneous evangelistic campaign which will open October 1, to continue for three weeks.

This plan, which was inaugurated in 1904, has been successfully adopted in over fifty cities; the territory covered extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Mobile to New England.

Newcastle will be divided into four districts. Dr. Chapman will be assisted by Mr. Chas. F. Allen, his chorus leader; his accompanist, Chas. H. Marsh, of Pittsburg; and his soloist, Paul J. Gilbert, who sang for the great Torrey-Alexander meetings in Europe. The other districts will be in charge of the Rev. Dr. D. S. Toy and singer, Frank Dickson; the Rev. Dr. H. W. Stough and singer, Chas. E. Rykert; the Rev. Dr. Thomas Needham and singer, J. W. Reynolds. Mr. Ralph C. Norton, a prominent Y. M. C. A. worker, will have charge of the personal workers, and Mr. James Berwick, of Two Harbors, Minn., a special worker among railroad men, will assist in the work of the campaign. The Rev. William Asher and Mrs. Asher will conduct meetings in saloons, jails, station houses, and in the various manufacturing plants. The Rev. C. LeRoy Butler, the colored evangelist, will have charge of the meetings for colored people.

These simultaneous meetings conducted by Dr. Chapman are strictly interdenominational. The officers of the committee in charge of the meeting in Newcastle are: Chairman, Rev. John Snape, pastor of the First Baptist Church; secretary, Rev. E. E. Higley, pastor of the First Methodist Church; chairman, finance committee, R. A. McKinley, of the Newcastle Notion Company; chairman of the music committee, Rev. M. Wilson Keith, of the Mahoningto Presbyterian Church; chairman of personal workers, Mr. George E. B gess, General Secretary of the Y. C. A.; chairman of the publicity c mittee, Mr. J. G. Nothdurft, of Dollar Savings Bank.

WOMEN AS BREAD-WINNERS

RAISING HENS, DUCKS, GUINEA-FOWL AND SQUABS AS A MEANS OF LIVELIHOOD

In the Brooder Yards

A Pair of White Guinea-Fowl

An Out-door Brooder

MONG the rapidly increasing multitude of self-supporting women who are crowding into offices and stores there are many who love the country a home life, yet few think of poultry and pet-stock ing as a means of earning a livelihood. Even the ner's wife and daughter, who are in closer touch with matters, invariably neglect this means of making ey which is positively "knocking at the door."

et it is essentially a woman's occupation, for it lutely needs the mother instinct to rear baby ones y kind successfully.

e country girl, and the woman fortunate enough to ess a good-natured husband who considers the family are sufficiently to become a commuter, can start out capital, gradually increasing stock and buildings xperience and business permit. The poor forlorn an who depends solely on herself must have sufficient ey to establish the place pay current expenses year.

e first step is to find a l farm, of from ten to ty acres, within twenty s of a city and from one o miles from a depot. uying is impossible, get ng lease with option of hase. Rent must not ed fifteen dollars a th (the monthly rental y first place was twelve rs, and for this I had teen acres, a nine-room e, barn, two sheds, ken-house, small smoke-e and summer kitchen). d water is absolutely ntial. Once settled on farm, look the chicken-e over carefully, and s it is in unusually d condition, get some y good roofing paper, h will cost about $1.50 roll of two hundred re feet. Freedom from p and draft is as im-ant to success as clean-ss. To be sanitary, a chicken-house must be white-hed once a month during warm weather and as late in fall and early in the spring as weather permits. A ding twenty-four feet by twelve will accommodate hens. The best general purpose birds are White ndottes, Plymouth Rocks or Rhode Island Reds. can purchase good birds for market and egg pro-tion at a dollar each. Cockerels (roosters under a old) will cost two or three dollars each; one is essary for each flock of ten hens when eggs are ted for incubation. From such a flock you should at least two dozen eggs a day. Strictly fresh eggs never sell for less than twenty-four cents a dozen often bring double that amount. Fourteen dozen eek at twenty-five cents would be $3.50. Feed ot cost more than $1.50. Profit for the week ld be $2.

n incubator that holds 120 eggs costs $20; two ders, $24. These should be added to the estab-ment in January, and started not later than the , so that chicks may be hatched towards the first k in February. Incubators require twenty-one s. Thus you can fill the machine three times before March 20. A very poor percentage would be 70 chicks for each hatch, 210 chicks in all. Cost of 360 eggs at 25 cents a dozen, $7.50. Oil for heating incubators and brooders, $1. Feed for three months, liberally estimated, $6. Entire cost of the 200 chickens up to three months old will be $14.50. The usual average of a hatching is half pullets, half cockerels.

If you keep all the pullets, to increase laying stock for next fall, there will be 100 broilers, weighing a pound and a half each, to sell in May and June at 20 cents a pound—a gross return of $30. Deducting the $14.50 for feed, etc., you have $15.50 in cash and 100 pullets.

Eight empty barrels from your groceryman cost 10 cents each. Square lids to cover the tops are easily made. A coat of tar on the outside makes them so slippery that rats and mice can't run up them. Wherever the barrels stand, put bricks or blocks of wood under them, so that air can circulate between the bottom of the barrel and the floor, to prevent damp and mildew. Here are the simple instructions:

All being ready, buy bags of ground feed (oats and corn), white middlings, bran, linseed meal, animal meal, whole corn, wheat, oats, millet seed, and a bale of clover hay. Start operations by putting in a dry dishpan two quarts each of ground feed and bran and a quart of animal meal. Mix thoroughly with your hands and empty into barrel No 1. Repeat that till the materials are all used up. This is to form the foundation of mash No. 1.

Start the next by placing two quarts of middlings and a quart of linseed meal in your dish-pan. Mix thoroughly and put it in barrel No. 2, and go on till full. This is mash No. 2. Now you need a saucepan with a close-fitting lid, that will hold from five to ten quarts, according to the number of hens you have. To prepare mash No. 1: Take from barrel No. 1, one quart of the mixture for every ten birds. Put it in a saucepan, and just moisten with boiling water, really boiling. Cover and stand behind the stove until morning. For mash No. 2: One quart of clover hay, cut into half-inch lengths. Place in the saucepan and pour over a quart of boiling water. Cover and stand to steam for two hours. Mix a pint of barrel No. 2, and again let it stand in a warm place till morning. All mashes must be moist, never wet; fed just warm, never hot.

Long, V-shaped wooden troughs are best to feed the mashes in.

A Flock of Young Pekin Ducks

On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, in the morning give mash No. 1 and scatter a half-pint of millet seed. At night, one pint of whole corn, one pint of oats. On Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, give in the morning, mash No. 2. At noon, cut green food, and half-pint of kaffir corn, scattered. At night, one pint of wheat, one pint of corn. On Sunday morning, mash No. 1, and half-pint of barley. At noon, cabbage cut in half, or turnip. At night, corn and oats.

The noon meal may be omitted sometimes on Sundays. On Monday morning, wheat, and cracked corn or barley, may be used instead of mash, so as to save mixing on Sunday night. Plenty of sharp grit must invariably be accessible to the birds, and fresh water night and morning.

The question is often asked, "How much food per hen?" This can only be answered approximately, for about every breed differs and almost every hen has individuality. The best thing a beginner can do is to put the mash into the trough, see how much they will eat in ten or fifteen minutes, and thereafter give about half that quantity; for their crops should not be filled in the morning, so that they will be busy all day scratching and hunting food. At night a good feed is all right. All potatoes and apple peelings can be boiled up and mixed with bran for a change. It saves feed, as will any other garden produce, and if only a few fowls are kept, table scraps are excellent.

October is the time to gather up all the leaves you can find from the woods; also the nuts, for, smashed up, they make a good noon feed now and then, besides amusing the birds for hours.

Skim milk is good, either to scald and mix mash with, or given as drink. If you are where it is impossible to get meat scraps or green bone, buy beef scraps by the bag, and add to No. 1 mixture—one quart to each four quarts of grain.

About April 10, hens must be put on lighter diet. Whole corn at night should gradually give place to wheat, two parts, cracked corn, one part. Morning mash can have an increase of ground oats and a corresponding decrease in corn. Take advantage of all spring greens, remembering that grass must be cut into short lengths; otherwise, the hens, in their eagerness to get the desired change of diet, will swallow long pieces, which are apt to cause them to become "crop-bound." Cool, fresh drinking water should be before them all the time. Dust bath will be more constantly in use as the weather gets warmer, so should be refilled with clean coal ashes or dry earth two or three times a week. Do not use wood ashes anywhere round hens or chicks, because, should they eat them, bowel trouble will be the result. Allow plenty of ventilation in the house.

Nothing should be given to baby chicks for the first twenty-four hours. The second day, hard-boiled eggs, chopped fine, without removing the shells, and mixed

Christianity's Centre

ONE of the utterances of Bishop Ingram in his recent sermon at Richmond, Va., emphasizes so strongly a principle which has been urged again and again in these columns, that we may be excused for calling attention to it. The Bishop, in describing the characteristics of the Church that will live and do useful work in this world, said it was a church that eschewed what had come to be known as the new theology. No more important fact in relation to Christianity could have been uttered. The new theology omits from its creed the doctrine of the Atonement, or rather, retaining the name, it strips it of its meaning and power. The meaning that Christ himself gave it in his conversation with Nicodemus, which Paul iterated and reiterated in his epistles, and which Peter made the central truth of his preaching and writing, does not commend itself to the apostles of the new theology. They would make of Christ an example and would regard his death on the cross as simply a supreme expression of God's love for mankind. The old theology admits those ideas, but it goes further and declares that Christ died the just for the unjust. It is at this point that the new and the old theologies part company.

As we have pointed out in these columns repeatedly, the essential doctrine of Christianity is the person and voluntary sacrifice of Christ. Preaching in which that doctrine is not kept to the front must fail. Without it, Christianity becomes a mere philosophy, not a religion, and fails to relieve the sinner of his burden. The man awakened to his condition, groaning under the load of his past sin, and distrusting his power to make the future better than the past, finds in Christ, and nowhere else, the remedy for his trouble. The Christ who has borne our sins on the tree, and the Christ who is able to transform us into his image, is the Christ that meets the human need. He is the Redeemer that satisfies the world, and any church that ignores him, turns its back on the mightiest force in the universe. The new theologian opposes the doctrine, shrinks in delicate horror from the idea of the blood, denounces vicarious sacrifice as "a doctrine of the shambles," but he has no substitute for it. This doctrine is the life and centre of Christianity, and wherever it is preached results follow. It is the remedy that cures, the divine force that transforms character; and that is the thing poor sin-burdened humanity needs. The preacher may leave to the theologian the task of defending the philosophy of the atonement; his mission is to win souls from sin to righteousness, and for that purpose there is but one method that has proved its power. Therefore, though to the ritualist the doctrine is a stumbling-block, and to the philosophic new theologian foolishness, "we preach Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God."

A New Danger

EVERY American is proud of the great strides that have been made in the engineering and building arts by men who have learned their business in American schools, and who seem to be advancing more rapidly in accomplishing noteworthy things than some of their professional brethren abroad. We admire big ships, big bridges, and big buildings, and, spurred on by popular approval, our engineers strain every nerve to create something more wonderful than has ever been built before.

The passion to do wonderful things, however, has brought dangers in its train. The great steamers, it is true, seem to be safe; but the disaster at the new Quebec bridge, which was to be the largest in the world, is yet fresh in the public mind. The latest alarm is in regard to the American "skyscraper." In New York there is nearing completion a building that is over five hundred feet high. Beside it, buildings that were once wondered at seem like dwarfs beside a giant. The Chief of the New York Fire Department was asked what he thought of the present rage for tower-like structures. He said that the large cities, both East and West, are bidding for terrible catastrophes. The San Francisco earthquake proved that in a great sheet of flame no building is really fireproof; that, before it, bricks, stone and iron crumble to pieces. Of course, against an ordinary fire, they are what they claim to be, fireproof.

The Chief pointed out the fact that no fire can be fought over two hundred feet above the street. He said that if a conflagration started in one of the upper stories of a "skyscraper," in a district where there were several others, the flames would leap from building to building, and the tops would be scaled off down to the fire-fighting limit. A fire might start from them that would get beyond control and an entire city be reduced to ashes.

This is no idle alarm, and some cities are already limiting the height of structures in the business districts. Boston has ordered that no building shall go higher than water can be thrown from a fire department hose. A city that adopts such a regulation may not have so many astonishing buildings to look at, but it will be a safer place to live in than one where the streets are like canyons, with towers for side walls. No one seems to know where the race for high structures will end. They are getting ready at the present time to build one over eight hundred feet high in New York City.

China's Constitution

ALL the world is interested in the news that China, after many centuries of despotic rule, is at last about to join the ranks of the constitutional governments. That remarkable woman, the Empress Dowager, who is still the real ruler of 400,000,000 Asiatic subjects in all but the name, has issued an imperial decree attesting the fact that the empire is now a constitutional monarchy. To what extent Japan's influence and the example of her wonderful progress have contributed to this change, can only be conjectured; but it is unquestionable that these have aided in precipitating a departure which might otherwise have been delayed for many years.

Even before the formal announcement, the reform movement in China had attained formidable proportions. Empress Dowager Tsz-Hi five years ago had ordered the provincial schools to introduce the "new learning," the general term employed in China to denote European and American educational methods. On every side her statesmen saw the growing power and influence of Western ideas in strengthening, uplifting and developing the ancient East. When Chang-Chih-Tung, one of the most sagacious statesmen of the empire, submitted his reform programme some time ago, they were not slow to perceive its advantages and were gratified by its adoption at the hands of the Empress Dowager.

But while the education of China on modern models has begun auspiciously, progress will be slow necessarily. In a country so vast, and with nearly one-third of the human race as population, the majority of them ignorant, superstitious, accustomed to the ancient usages of an almost primitive civilization, it will require more than one generation to accomplish a material change. When the transformation is complete, the venerable empire may take her place among the great Powers of the world.

There are gratifying indications that the attitude of China toward foreigners is becoming greatly modified of late. This is due in no small degree to the influence of foreign sympathy during the late famine, and especially to the outpouring of generous gifts from our own people, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which were the means under Providence of saving hundreds of thousands of lives. That relief work, performed by a great band of missionaries and native helpers, brought to the people of China a new revelation of the Gospel, which is now more eagerly welcomed than at any previous period of Christian effort in that country.

Cheerfulness a Duty

ONE of the best features of the Christian philosophy is that it makes men and women optimists; it teaches us to look on the bright side of life and always to prepare for pleasing surprises, rather than misfortunes. Even when sorrow comes—as come it does to us all at times—we can school ourselves to accept it with a degree of serenity, as part of the discipline of human experience, and thank God for it. Doing this, we transform it into blessing.

This cheerful philosophy holds good in the majority of human affairs, great or little. We know there are some Christians who find it hard at times to get out of the Adullam cave. They seem to gravitate toward its gloomiest depths on the approach of trouble; whereas, if they had faith to come out in the sunshine and trust in God for the rest, the trouble would soon disappear. Our strength and encouragement are according to our faith. If we place our hand in His hand and st out bravely, he will see us safely to the very end the road.

There are some people who are forever prophesyi evil. With them, every day is a day of ominous porten If they are to be believed, we might look forward to cr failures, wars and a general business panic in wh everything of consequence would go to smash. They w their wise heads and admit, sorrowfully of course, th things look well enough just at present, but as to t future—look out!

True cheerfulness is the offspring of goodness of hea cleanliness of life and a good conscience, that trusts the divine wisdom for all things and in all emergenci It is one of the finest qualities of life and should cultivated by everybody. As a mere asset in the strug of existence it is worth a fortune. It puts the heart tune to praise God. Cheerless Christians, of the lon faced, despondent kind, are poor representatives of t religion "which maketh the heart glad." They are li the spies who give a gloomy report of the land, where happiness awaits those who enter.

Among the Workers

—THE CONGRESS of National Purity Workers meets in Bat Creek, Mich., October 31 to November 6. Nearly one hund well-known leaders in religion and reform will take part in discussions.

—MISSIONARY R. H. BENDER, of San Salvador, writes of a revi at Sonsonate, with several conversions. On the Balsam coast, meetings were stoned by fanatical natives, but the workers w wonderfully protected.

—ANNA AGNES SMITH, the young Methodist evangelist, has j finished an extended evangelistic tour of the United States a Canada. She is now conducting services in the Methodist Ep copal Church, West Orange, N. J.

—THE LAKE MOHONK CONFERENCE of friends of the Indian a other dependent peoples will complete its twenty-fifth year at annual meeting, October 23 to 25. Discussion will cover Indians, the Philippines and Hawaii.

—DR. A. S. ORNE, of Syracuse, N. Y., known as the Father the Juvenile Court System, has traveled in Gospel wagons forty-two States, ministering to the erring and the needy. Mu of his work has been among neglected children.

—THE COUNTESS VON BOOS-FARRAR, a relative of the late Ar deacon Farrar, is now in New York. She is deeply interested the Prison-Gate Work of the Salvation Army. The Countess gifted with a beautiful voice and has on several occasions sung the prisoners in the Tombs. She sang lately to the men of Bowery Mission.

—EVANGELIST R. A. TORREY has issued a call to prayer for a gr spiritual revival in Chicago. He writes us: "Pray that Chic may be shaken as never before in its history. Pray that the sp of conviction of sin may fall on all classes. Pray that thousa may be truly converted. Pray that many of the abandoned n and women in the city may be saved to holy, noble lives. P that fire may be kindled in Chicago that will spread through whole land."

Annam's New King

FROM a throne to an asylum for lunatics is a reverse of fortune that seldom occurs. There have been many kings who deserved to be put under restraint, but the country that lives under monarchical institutions generally has so high a respect for the kingly office, that it is reluctant to show the occupant of the throne any discourtesy. The little kingdom of Annam, which lies between Siam and the sea, on the south of China, had until recently a monster of a peculiar diabolic type on the throne. He was set there by the French in 1889, in succession to the legitimate king, Dongkhan, who was deposed. The new king, Than-Tai, developed a strange malignant character, taking delight in witnessing the torture of any person about his court who offended him. He was singularly ingenious in inventing new forms of torture, which protracted the victim's sufferings during long periods. This singular form of regal amusement grew more al more fascinating for him, until it bame a monomania. Some of the vims, including his own wives, had gen him no offense, but he wanted h favorite pastime, and he would sect a victim by caprice. The Hnch, who were responsible for ging him power, at length decided to rnove him, and they have now placed h under restraint and have made his s ond son, a child eight years old, king i his stead. The condition of Annam i nomalous. The king is supposed to t the supreme ruler and government i carried on in his name, but the actual nagement of public affairs is in the hds of an officer appointed by the Hnch government. The social affairs a l continue in the hands of the king, a l he is thus able to oppress his people v hout restraint. The French supremr over the kingdom dates back to 83, when France consolidated its power er Tonquin. China objected to the cupation, but finally yielded, and in 83 ceded Tonquin to France and conted to Annam being placed under Hnch protection, on the pledge that t ancient forms of government should l respected. The pledge has been obved, and its responsibilities have often n onerous. It may be hoped that the w king who has been chosen by France l be so trained and educated as to oid the vices of his father, and to rule his people in hteousness.

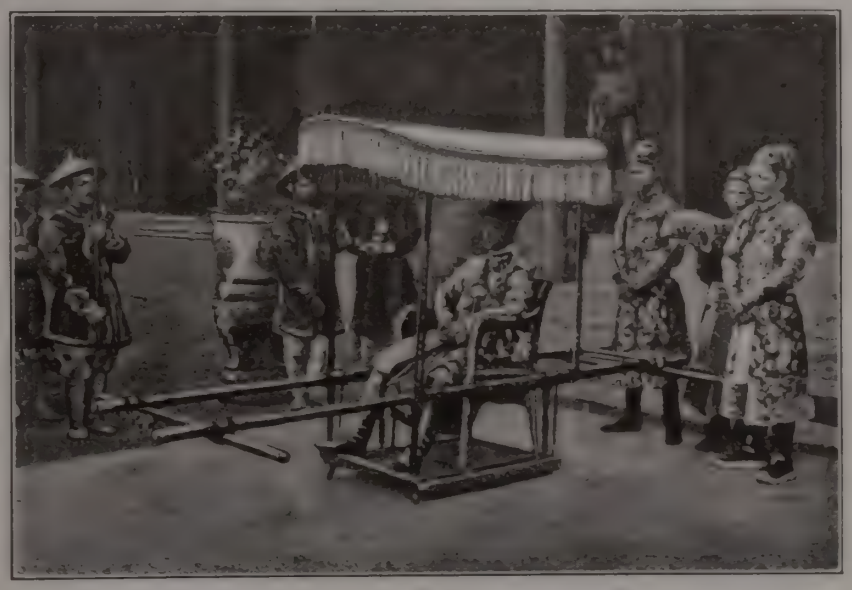
Mercy and truth preserve the king; and his throne is upholden mercy. (Prov. 20: 28.)

r. Taft in Japan

All classes in Japan, the Emperor and Empress, the mbers of the cabinet, the municipalities, the journals and the merchants, have united in tendering to our cretary of War a cordial reception. His stay in Japan s characterized by one round of entertainments, in ich the Japanese with unwonted enthusiam manifested eir pleasure in greeting Mr. Taft. They recognized at he came in an official as well as a personal capacity, d exerted themselves to do him honor. At one of the ceptions a silver tea service was presented to Mrs. ft as an expression of good will from the city of Yokoma. On his side Mr. Taft has uttered the most hearty rds of appreciation and friendship. He declared that e friction between the two countries was "due entirely the commercialism of the newspapers in America." He added that a war between the United States and Japan "would be a crime against modern civilization, and as wicked as it would be insane." Referring to the school trouble in San Francisco, he said that there was "nothing in the event that cannot be honorably and fully arranged by ordinary diplomatic methods between the two governments, conducted as they both are by statesmen of honor, sanity and justice." The speech was fully reported in the Japanese press, with appreciative editorial comments, and it had an excellent effect on the Japanese money market. Before Mr. Taft left Japan he had the honor of a reception by the Emperor, who sent an imperial equipage with a guard of honor to conduct him to the palace. The Emperor held a private conference with Mr. Taft, while the Empress entertained Mrs. Taft. An elaborate luncheon was provided at which the Emperor and Empress sat down with their American guests. Finally, when Mr. Taft was leaving, the Emperor sent a detachment of cavalry to escort him to the railroad depot. In view of the sending of our fleet to the Pacific, which some journals persist in regarding as a provocation to Japan, the Secretary's visit and the cordial good-will he expressed, cannot but have an amicable effect on the relations of the two governments.

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace! (Isa. 52: 7.)



The Insane, Malignant King Who Has Been Deposed

A Costly Cigarette

A press dispatch from Trinidad, Colo., says that at last the fire in Engleville coal mine has been brought under control. It is believed that the temperature will soon be so far reduced that mining operations may be resumed. The Engleville mine is one of the largest and most valuable properties of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company. It has been on fire now for more than a year and a half, and it was impossible to subdue the fire until recently. It appears that the fire was started by a Mexican youth who disregarded the prohibition of smoking in the mine. He lighted a cigarette, and while it was glowing he had occasion to enter a gasoline chamber. Forgetting all about the cigarette, he went into the chamber with it still in his mouth. Instantly, there was an explosion and an outbreak of flames, which speedily communicated to other parts of the mine. The loss to the company by the disaster will, it is estimated, exceed $100,000. Doubtless the young man had no intention of doing such vast mischief. He was simply thoughtless, but by this time men ought to have learned that nature takes no thought of motives, but takes vengeance alike on the careless and the criminal. The heedless word or act may cause as much loss and misery as if it was spoken or done intentionally.

Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth. (James 3: 5.)

A Conditional Bequest

A Philadelphia lady has made a bequest which involves a course intensely disagreeable to some of the beneficiaries. She has bequeathed to Swarthmore College, coal and mineral lands easily worth a million dollars. She made the bequest, however, conditional on the college abandoning all participation in intercollegiate sports and games. It appears that all through her life she had objected to athletic sports at colleges, because she believed that the students became absorbed in the games and neglected their studies. She also objected to the enmity which sometimes developed between colleges on account of athletics. In her life she did everything she could to discourage college sports. She has now given, in her will, a practical evidence of her dislike to the system by directing that if the trustees decline to fulfil the conditions of the bequest, the money shall be devoted to the use of a hospital in which she has taken considerable interest. It remains to be seen whether the college will abandon a popular course that it may secure so large an addition to its endowment. If it does so the college will be attractive to young men who are of the apostle's opinion and are desirous of gaining knowledge rather than physical development.

Exercise thyself rather unto godliness, for bodily exercise profiteth little. (I. Tim. 4: 7, 8).

Hotel or a Bride

A hotel-keeper in Pittsburg, Pa., has been placed on the horns of a dilemma recently. He is a young bachelor who is considered a prosperous man. His father formerly conducted the hotel, from which he acquired a modest fortune and retired, leaving the business in his son's hands. Early this summer a young lady came on a visit to friends at Pittsburg and the young hotel keeper made her acquaintance. The two young people became attached and finally a proposal of marriage was made by the young man. The girl acknowledged her love for him, but refused to accept his offer. Pressed for her reasons, she said that she had an intense horror of the liquor traffic, and as there was a bar connected with the hotel, she could not bear the thought of being in any way associated with the trade. The young man did his utmost to remove her objections, pointing out that a man on the verge of marriage would be imprudent in sacrificing the business which was the only means of his making a livelihood for his prospective wife. The girl, however, was firm. Much as she loved him, she said she would rather give up the prospect of marriage than be the wife of a liquor dealer. The deadlock has now been broken by the young man selling his business and looking around for some other occupation. Such an incident deserves notice in these days when the love of money is supposed to be the most powerful of all passions. The man who would give up a prosperous business rather than the girl he loved, proves that love is, as the apostle says, the greatest thing in the world.

The greatest of these is love. (I. Cor. 13: 13.)

Kindness Misunderstood

A painful occurrence was witnessed a few days ago in a district of East New York, in which a large number of Jewish families have settled. A lady stood on a corner of a street waiting for a surface car. She saw a little girl in tattered clothing, carrying a baby almost as heavy as herself, plodding along toward her. She has children of her own and felt a deep sympathy with the girl. She spoke a few words of encouragement to her, and gave her some candy out of her satchel. The mother of the child happened to be looking out of her window and saw the candy given. Instantly, the stories she had heard of children being kidnapped by persons who began an acquaintance with them in that way came to her mind, and she thought her own child was menaced. She put her head out of the window and screamed in Yiddish: "Kidnapper! my child is being stolen!" Men and women, who understood her, rushed from the teeming tenements, and attacked the lady with household utensils, and she was saved from being beaten to death only by the arrival of a policeman, who beat off her assailants with his club. She was taken to the nearest hospital for treatment. Thus one person suffers for the iniquity of another. People will for a time be afraid of doing a kindly act or saying an encouraging word to a child, lest their kindness be misunderstood and they be suspected of meditating one of those hideous crimes which have caused parents so much anxiety and sorrow. It is necessary in this world of unjust and uncharitable suspicion to heed the apostolic warning:

Let not then your good be evil spoken of. (Rom. 14: 16.)

China's Constitution Proclaimed

CHINA, the oldest of empires, is at last arousing from its lethargy. From Pekin comes the intelligence by cable that the Dowager Empress has issued a decree declaring the government of the "Flowery Kingdom" to be a constitutional monarchy. This means, in effect, that the ancient despotic rule is to be superseded by a benignant imperial administration, which will accord to the several provinces due representation in a council to sit in Pekin. This council or Parliament, the first in China's long history, will exercise both legislative and advisory functions. What its precise duties and powers will be has not been defined; but it will be the first step towards a recognition by the throne of the voice of the provinces in the nation's affairs. It is understood also that a measure of self-government will be granted to each of the eighteen provinces, and that provincial legislative assemblies will be constituted, to make laws for the people. In every province, the highest official will be a representative of the imperial government, to which alone he will be responsible. These changes will no doubt be effected by slow stages. As to the prospective participation of the people themselves in the affairs of government, nothing can yet be gathered from the meagre information at hand. There is no intimation of anything like popular suffrage being in contemplation. Indeed, the prospect of the ballot being granted to China's millions is still remote; for it is inconceivable that a people of 407,000,000 souls, occupying a territory of over one and a half million square miles, a great part of it sunk in idolatry and dense ignorance for ages, should be able, as a whole, even to comprehend the nature of the tremendous transformation that has just begun. Still, even a limited franchise, which would give to the intelligent property-owning class a voice in provincial affairs, is not an improbability.

The Emperor of China

The Empress and Dowager Empress

For more than a decade China has been slowly moving in the direction of administrative reform, and it is evident that Japan's amazing progress has stimulated the reform element in the older nation to the final effort which has now been crowned with success. For a long time, the imperial power frowned upon the reformers. Many of the leaders were persecuted; some were put in prison, and others exiled. Such brilliant and able men as K'ang Yu-wei, Liang Ki-Chou, Prince Pu-Lun, Lien-Feng, Prince Tsai Tsai, and others, who are recognized as among the foremost thinkers in the empire, labored earnestly, yet apparently in vain. It seemed for years as though the imperial court party, with the astute Dowager Empress Tsz-Hi at its head, foresaw in the agitation the doom of the Manchu dynasty, and the reformers were antagonized at every point and pursued relentlessly.

But the reform movement grew despite opposition. It made still more rapid progress when Gen. Yuan Shih-Kai, Sir Liang Cang, Wu Ting Fang and other distinguished men espoused the cause, and urged upon the throne the consideration of a policy which would place China in the forefront of Asiatic nations. Over 4,000,000 Chinese, many of them of the cultured class, followed the leadership of these reformers, and the throne, at the suggestion of the observant Dowager Empress, this time inclined its ear to listen patiently.

One of the most important government officials—a man respected throughout China and trusted by the Emperor Kuang Hsu—was enabled fortunately to bring matters to a focus. He forwarded to Pekin a memorial submitting an outline of reforms, which he strongly commended to the Emperor's consideration as most desirable for the welfare and development of the nation. These were fully discussed, and it is said that they were especially approved by the Dowager Empress, who saw that the time was opportune for imperial action.

Some reforms of great importance are already under way, while others will begin in the near future. Under the leadership of the able General Yuan Shih-Kai, the Chinese army is undergoing complete modernization in all branches of the service. Native foundries are now turning out steels of quality equal to the best European or American product. Many new railroad and telegraph lines are in course of construction. Schools and colleges are springing up in all directions and Western methods of education are no longer ignored. There is a prospect that a much needed reform—looking to the general reduction of taxes—will soon be inaugurated, which will materially benefit manufacturers, agriculturists and small traders. The antiquated methods of punishment are to be superseded by modern and humane methods. Young Chinese are to be sent abroad in increasing numbers to be educated at foreign schools and colleges and study Western ways and conditions. Manual industries of the old-fashioned sort will disappear as labor-saving machinery comes into use, which it is already doing rapidly. One of the most notable results of the recent awakening of the ancient empire is the increasing tolerance of foreigners. There is a liberalizing process going on which affects all classes, from the officials and literati down to the humble villagers. Doubtless the bounteous and timely aid sent from foreign lands in the famine time, and especially from the United States, has contributed largely to this result. America's generosity has helped to transform public opinion in China regarding Americans in general and American missionaries in particular. It has been a most significant factor at this critical time of national change, and has done more to open Chinese doors and hearts to the teachings of the Gospel than all the efforts that have been made in the last twenty years.

Weighing Out Relief Flour at Antung

Letters from China are full of encouragement, showing conclusively that the results of the famine relief work have been more important and far-reaching than even the most sanguine could have anticipated. Good deeds are cumulative in their results, and now, our missionary correspondents in many points assure us, the effects of the generous relief operations conducted in the old northwest provinces of Shansi and Shensi, in the provinces along the Canton River, and more recently in the provinces bordering on the Grand Canal, and north of the old bed of the Yellow River, are uniting to produce a most surprising and welcome change in the hearts of countless multitudes of Chinese. Not only is the old antagonism to foreigners disappearing, but the feelings and the attitude of the people toward Americans especially is becoming exceedingly cordial and appreciative, the result of their splendid generosity in China's time of need. Best of all, the hearts of the people are everywhere opening to the Gospel message.

An Eighty-year-old Sufferer Happy

This aged woman got a bag of CHRISTIAN HERALD flour, and bore it off thankfully. The other figures are helpers in relief work.

"For more than three months," writes Rev. C. [illegible] Parsons, of the China Inland Mission in Anhui, "a steady stream of outside relief was poured into this district, and the effect produced upon the Chinese is unmistakably plain. The foreigner is no longer an object of suspicion and fear, and his religion is spoken of with reverence, from the lowliest hut to the home of the proudest Confucianist. The Chinese want to know more about the One who has inspired so many in other lands with the thought of sending relief.

"An unparalleled opportunity is presented for giving the Gospel to this district, and an aggressive spiritual campaign by foreigners and natives should not be delayed. These Chinese are blindly groping for the Light, the first bright rays of which have fallen across their path in their hour of distress."

Rev. C. B. Titus, of the American Disciples Mission, who gave the longest term of relief service of any missionary living outside of the famine area, sends us a most interesting letter, showing the religious activity that has followed the famine, and the spirit of inquiry that has been awakened among all classes. He says:

"The Chinkiang and Shanghai committees did well in securing and promptly forwarding the foodstuffs to the central stations, and Dr. Woods lost no time in getting his share to the out-stations. Our eight Chinese helpers daily gave out from six to seven tons of flour or kaoliang to feed 25,000 to 30,000 famine sufferers. We also tried at the same time to give out the Bread of Life. On every Lord's day we stopped all work, except that to save life, and we preached the Gospel. We also preached every week-day evening. A Chinese evangelist, Chang, from Nanking Presbyterian School, assisted me for three weeks. At first, the local gentry, police and others came in to hear and see this "new thing" (li pai); and later, large delegations from the country relief works crowded the room. One of the town elders brought his three sons two Sundays in succession. He carried the Bible which Missionary Beals of Wuhu had given him, and asked me for a hymn book which Dr. Woods afterwards sent him. Three weeks before I left, the district magistrate called, and during conversation I showed him the true foundation of a Christian nation's greatness—the Bible; upon which he asked for and I presented him with a copy. Two of the helpers were professed Christians, and another said he wanted to be a 'Jesus disciple,' on Mr. Woodbury's earnest exhortation.

Food for the Whole Family

"At times, when taking a country walk, a group of farmers would gather round me in sight of one of their earth-gods' temples, and I would tell them to turn from these idols and put their trust in the true God, our Father in heaven, who loved them so much. He had sent his son to help them; in fact, the flour and kaoliang they were receiving was a proof of his good-will toward them, for it came through the influence of the Gospel of Christ, God's power for their salvation. One day a man remarked sadly: 'Oh, if you were here two or three years, we would know better and do better.' Toward the close of our stay, the inquiry became frequent: 'Are you not going to establish a kiao tang (religious chapel) here?'

"The number of deaths, directly and indirectly due to starvation, has perhaps not been over-estimated. One here and one there, all over this vast famine region, in some places less, in some places more, have died and been buried by relatives or others, impelled by immemorial custom or superstitious dread that otherwise the spirits of the dead would return to afflict the living.

Rev. Z. Charles Beals, of Wuhu, writes:

"Another noble effort is being undertaken by your readers to open up a large orphanage in the famine district, where at least one thousand orphans can be looked after by trusted missionaries. This means that not only will these children be temporarily provided for, but, no doubt, about all will find Christ as a Saviour and many of them will become Christian workers to their own people. May God wonderfully bless you all and give back to you a still richer blessing! What you do for these poor children will give them a chance to know God and to be a blessing to others."

Many of the missionaries write, giving new and interesting incidents in connection with the relief work during the great famine. Rev. James B. Woods, of Tsing-kiang-pu, writes: "Our work was entirely in the country and we opened up fifteen different centres, at distances varying from ten to fifty miles from Tsing-kiang-pu. Relief work consisted in giving flour at nominal rates to holders of tickets, these tickets being given out only where careful investigation was made from house to house to all the needy in the district. Each centre would feed from 12,000 to 30,000 people; where those too poor to pay even the nominal sum of money were found, free tickets were given.

"Tsing-kiang-pu was the centre of famine relief work for three hsiens or counties, these counties being about the size of counties in the States, and having an aggregate population of 1,500,000.

Our flour depots have fed 141,900 people, so that (including industrial work, road making, canal drainage, etc.), over 500,000 people have been fed and helped from this centre. Our relations with the people have been most pleasant. At first there was a great deal of opposition from the officials; but later on this was changed, and the taotai (intendant of circuit) cheerfully gave us guards to insure the safe arrival of the flour, etc., at our depots. Once or twice bags were stolen, but the thieves were caught and punished, and the loss made good. After this it went across country safely.

"It is gratifying to see the appreciation of the people for what has been done. As we passed on a village the other day, one old man said: 'Thus American flour has saved the lives of tens of thousands.' Another said: 'For the Kaoliang given us this year we thank you, we shall not forget it.' This leading man, a large landowner in a poor district, told me that but for this help half the people in the two adjacent townships would have starved to death (about 20,000 people), and that in the autumn, usually very lawless, robberies almost cease this spring. This gentleman has offered a plot of ground for a church, and in several other places the people are asking to be taught the Gospel, 'the doctrine that teaches men so to help others.'

"Not only have all Christians joined in contributing, but in distributing. Forty two men from various missions have most cordially and efficiently aided us at this place.

"The magnificent work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and of others has strengthened friendly relations between China and America. Chinese boycotts will be less likely to occur in the future. A deep impression has been made. Hundreds of thousands of lives have been saved. A unique opportunity is now offered in this region to bring these people to Christ, the only one who can save and lift up this people, avert famines and bring peace among the nations.

"It is impossible to describe one's feelings as the harvest ripened. What breathless anxiety; what intense interest in the outcome! How many days yet? In these yellow fields is life to multitudes—not simply comfort and support, but life. May all those who have helped the famine sufferers still remember them, that they may yet reap the harvest of character, progress, higher attainments and life eternal."

The Okayama Orphans

READERS of this journal will doubtless recall the fact that at the conclusion of the Japanese famine, over a year ago, when the appeal for aid for the famine orphans was issued, the great orphanage at Okayama flung its hospitable doors wide open to the little army of sufferers. Rev. J. H. Pettee, a Christian missionary who was specially interested in this particular work, wrote us that Mr. Ishii, the founder and superintendent of the orphanage, had already 350 children under his care when the famine swept this new army of some 800 helpless orphans to his gates. This was the situation when the last remittance of $25,000 was sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the Missionary Committee at Sendai. That committee applied this final sum to orphan support, sending half the amount, or $12,500, to the Okayama Orphanage, and dividing the other half among the various Tohoku orphan asylums, which were all equally needy. The gift to the Okayama Orphanage came at a time when the resources of that institution were completely exhausted. Now that the year has passed, the problem of support has again come to the surface. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who took such a deep interest in the famine orphans of India, have also shown a warm sympathy in behalf of these helpless Japanese children, many of whom are little more than babies. Voluntary offers of support for the next year have already been received from our readers for 93, but what of the remaining 700 or more? It costs $20 a year to maintain one of these little waifs at the orphanage, which includes clothing, feeding, shelter, medical attendance and such training as the child is capable of receiving. We shall be glad to hear from any readers who are interested in this work.

Three Magnificent Bibles

Dear Christian Herald—The Three Book Letter Bibles I ordered from you to be given my three daughters as presents have come to my address in perfect order. My daughters are highly pleased with them. I have examined a great many premium Bibles, but I think the three Christian Herald Bibles the most perfect of all. Give my best regards to Dr. Kinsley. I trust God may bless and may live long to bless mankind.

THE "GREAT-HEART" OF ISRAEL

WHEN the Land of Promise was to be divided among the Israelites, Caleb requested that Hebron might be assigned to him. Between the fall of Jericho and that request many things had happened. The first was the defeat of the Israelites at Ai, when "the hearts of the people melted, and became as water." Defeat came because there was a traitor among them. Achan had taken of the silver and gold at Jericho, which was devoted to God; and as a punishment he had been stoned to death. Then came a second battle at Ai, which resulted in victory, because God helped. Then there was the building of an altar on Mount Ebal by Joshua, by whom the law thereon inscribed was read to Israel. After that came Joshua's league with the Gibeonites, secured through deceit. The Gibeonites got no honor, as they were made to serve as hewers of wood and drawers of water; but they saved their cities from destruction by the Israelites. Then came the great battle of Beth-Horon, in which five kings and their armies fought against Israel. The Lord himself fought for Israel, using as ammunition great hailstones, which destroyed the armies, while the kings fled and hid themselves in a cave, from which they were afterwards brought out and beheaded by Joshua with his own sword. With this battle is connected the standing still of the sun at the command of Joshua. About this there has been much controversy, but in some miraculous way the coming on of darkness was delayed until the battle was finished. After Beth-Horon came the battle of Merom, where Joshua and his forces fought against the so-called "king of Canaan," known as "Jabin the Wise." All of the Canaanite races were banded together for one mighty conflict on the northern extremity of Palestine. They had come from the south as far as Jebus (Jerusalem), and from the sea plain of Philistia, and from Sharon. For the first time Israel was to meet a foe armed with chariots. Of that battle we only know that God delivered the Canaanites into the hand of Israel. This was the last great battle of the conquest. These events are recorded in Joshua, chapters 8, 9, 10, 11 (which should be read by all in studying this lesson).

An Unholy Alliance

"Hebron, which became the inheritance of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite"

Then came the division of the land. Each tribe was first to be located, and then each family given absolute title to a farm or plot in the Land of Promise. Caleb claimed that Hebron should be his portion, where he had forty years before, as one of the twelve spies, found the best fruits and the strongest enemies. Moses had at that time promised Caleb that Hebron should be given to him as a reward for his bravery and faithfulness in trying to persuade the people to enter the Promised Land, notwithstanding the giants. In this request at eighty-five years of age, Caleb again showed himself most brave and stalwart, for the giants were still there, and must be dispossessed before he could enjoy his portion. Joshua granted his request, and gave him his blessing.

Caleb's Ancestral Claim

Possibly there may have been another reason why Caleb wished to possess Hebron. He had an ancestral claim upon it, which had been bartered away by Esau when he sold his birthright for a mess of pottage; for unlike the Israelites, who were the descendants of Jacob, Caleb was a Kenezite, so called from being a descendant of Kenaz, the son of Esau. He had been adopted into the tribe of Judah. When the Anakim heard that Caleb had been made lord over their land, they knew they had not long to stay there. As a matter of fact, Caleb soon subdued their walled cities, and routed the three sons of Anak, Sheshai, Ahiman and Talmai, so that the land is said to "have had rest from wars."

The story of Caleb's life pictures a Christian life in its three great essentials: 1. Adoption. 2. Faith. 3. Faithfulness. It is passing strange that Jews of later periods could have had such strong race prejudices when their chief ruler, by their own choice, at their entrance into Palestine, and for forty-five or more years previous was Caleb, an adopted Kenezite, that is, a son of Esau. Heredity is mighty, but faith in God is more than a match for it. We hear much of degeneration, but regeneration can checkmate it. People often speak slightingly of foreign immigrants, but Caleb, the adopted citizen, was "an Israelite indeed," and the strongest tribe regarded him as its strongest man. He was an Israelite in spirit, though born outside, which is better than being a foreigner in spirit, though born inside, as were those Israelites who were ever sighing for the flesh-pots of Egypt. It matters little where a man was first born, provided he is truly born again. Such souls as Caleb's, which brave any peril because they believe in God, are the great need of every land—men of deed as well as creed, whose faith is made perfect in faithfulness. In a sense, we are all "strangers and foreigners," until in conversion we receive "the spirit of adoption."

Peril in Reward

When Caleb was a young man of forty, it will be remembered that he was selected by his tribe of Judah as one of its two chief princes for the dangerous and difficult duty of spying out the Land of Promise. His part of the task took him to Hebron; he was one of two, the other being Joshua, of another tribe, who reported that though giants were tall and city walls taller, Israel might and should go forward confidently because the Most High had promised to give them the land. God says it, and that settles it. That is faith in its first quarter, taking God at his word. Faith sees God towering triumphant above all obstacles, and cries, "Why should we fear anything with him looking at us?"

Instead of telling boys and girls hobgoblin stories of imaginary giants, let them be told of this real young man Caleb, who dared to go into the land of Arba, the chief of the giants, and who came back to lead his people, if they would, against armies of giants and their walled cities. There are few things, if any, from which the world suffers so much as from fears, all of which are due to lack of faith; for how can any one be afraid of anything who really believes an ever-present, all-wise God lives and loves and reigns? Alike to the child afraid of the friendly darkness of his bedroom, because of the ghost stories a foolish nurse has been telling; and to the mother, anxious about a sick child or next year's income; and to the father, afraid of some threatening enemy, God whispers: "Be not afraid; only believe."

What Faith Implies

Faith is not mere belief of the intellect. It is the whole man turning Godward: the belief of the intellect, the submission of the will, the trust of the heart, and the faithfulness—the faith made full in the life. Phillips Brooks describes the very heart of faith as receiving, by love and obedience, the vitality of another, and making it our own very life. "Faith is not love or obedience," he says, "but it works by both. A man may love me, and yet not have faith in me. A man may obey me, and yet not have faith in me. Faith is recognizable by this result, that the life of one soul becomes the life of another through obedience and love. So faith in Christ is that power by which the vitality of Christ, through our love and obedience to him, becomes our vitality. Christ is the Son of man, the perfect man, the divine man. H vitality filling us is the perfection of human life. The that believe are men raised to the highest power," Cale had not only the vision of God to make him brave, bu the life of God in his soul. That made him cheerfu when others were despondent, and brave when othe were afraid.

Anakim of Temptation

Let other young men repeat his long and strong lif by drinking at the same fountain of youth. Young me of to-day must often pass among the Anakim of might temptations, even when in the path of duty. As men i the full glow of abundant life have little to fear fro contagion, so men full of the divine life, who meet tem tation only in duty's path, will pass it unscathed. H only is safe who is saved. A good woman, who was we known in her circle for her simple faith and calm trus in the midst of many trials, received a visit from anothe woman who said, "I must go and find out the secret o her strong happy life." She went and introduced her self by asking: "Are you the woman with the grea faith?" "No," replied the other, "I am not the woma with the great faith; I am the woman with the littl faith in the great God."

Since the spying out of the land, forty-five years hav passed. Caleb is eighty-five years old, but he says he i as strong as ever, and he is proving himself as hopefu and brave by claiming the promise Moses then mad that he should have the rich country of the giants abou Hebron when the lan should be divided. Th giants are still there and their walled cities and to claim the prom ise means that Cale will, in God's name face and conquer th mightiest of Israel' foes. As in all nobl lives, God's best gift i something to conquer something to acquire Neither education no character comes to an of us ready made, an it is better if even ou business is one that w must ourselves develo Every old man wh believes in God shoul be stirred to renew th battle with evil in hin and around him by thi story of Israel's ol hero.

A distinguished liter ary lady at a receptio said to President Roose velt: "What characte in fiction comes neares to your ideal of wha a man should be?" "Greatheart, in Bun yan's Pilgrim's Prog ress," said the Presi dent, "is, in my estimation, the loftiest figure livin and moving in letters." The lady replied: "I an not so well up in modern fiction as I thought I was. Where will I find him?" "In the Delectable Moun tains," said the President, as he turned with a smile t other guests. Caleb has been called the Greatheart o the Old Testament. It should not be forgotten tha some Christian heroes are not called to flee from th city of Destruction, but to attack its giant evils an transform it into the city of God.

Caleb, the Aged Hero

A young preacher told his people how Alexander th Great at thirty conquered the world with an army of ol men; officers of sixty, privates of fifty, seasoned by many campaigns—it took only thirty-seven thousand of suc veterans for his great achievement. "Come, sixty-yea old officers! Come, fifty-year-old privates!" exclaime the preacher, "fall into line to win the world for God." Some talk of "the dead-line at fifty." There is no suc dead line at fifty, or even at eighty, for men into whon has come by faith that vitality of God that made Cale a hero at eighty-five. Michael Angelo painted his "Las Judgment" at seventy-seven, and completed St Peter's at eighty-eight. Among those who have con tinued their activities beyond threescore years an ten may be mentioned Cato, Plutarch, Gladstone Bismarck, Von Moltke, Lord Roberts, United State Senators Dawes, Cameron, Morrill, Thurman, Palmer Evarts; also David Dudley Field, Justice Field, Mark Hopkins, Professor Dana, Parke Godwin, Verdi, Momm sen, Curtius, Leon Say, Crispi, Bessemer, Pope Le XIII., Emperor William I., Queen Victoria, Dr. R. W McAll, Bishops Coxe, Huntington and Clarke; Horatius Bonar, Judge Story, Sir Henry Park, Dr. Willian Salmon, James Martineau and Julia Ward Howe.

A WOMAN'S VISIT TO THE CANAL ZONE

MISS GERTRUDE BEEKS, Secretary of the Welfare Department of the National Civic Federation, has returned after a five weeks' investigation of conditions in the Panama anal Zone. Her report, which has been presented, is f national interest. The outlines of the report are ven below:

She gave no attention to the tales of discharged and ssatisfied employees. She found that a great deal of nprovement had been made within the last two years the matter of taking care of the employees, but she und a great deal still to complain about.

"The casual visitor to the Isthmus," she writes, "execting to find only marshes is pleasantly surprised on seeing also beautiful mountain scenery. The imate is more endurable than in many parts of the nited States in summer. During the rainy season, hich extends over eight months, ending about the 1st January, there are periods when it is clear, but ere is continual moisture, which necessitates constant ring of bed clothing and woolen garments to prevent em from becoming musty. The dry season, which tends over four months, is described as most delightl. The cool nights necessitate sleeping under blants. The tropical light begets nervousness and energy sapped, making annual vacations imperative for mericans. While an extensive residence probably ould undermine health, the observance of ordinary ealth precautions renders a temporary stay upon the anal Zone quite safe."

The American workmen, including mechanics, clerks, nd others, number about 6,000, and are called emoyees. The rest of the working forces number 34,000 nd are made up of Greeks, Italians, Spaniards nd other Europeans, who are termed laborers. The mps are located between Colon and Panama, the mericans having seventeen camps and the laborers orty-six. There are many manufacturing villages in e United States that are not half so beautiful as the omes for the American families and the bachelors' ormitories. The Government furnishes quarters, furture and light free, and if one is married he gets fuel ee also.

Many competent men have been lost to the Canal ecause they could not get "married quarters," of which there is a shortage. There are some bachelor dormitories that provide for only two in a room. Miss Beeks recommends that they all be so arranged. She estimates that it will require a year to provide adequate accommodations for the workmen in the Zone.

The laborers, as well as the Americans, are compelled to buy their own blankets. Since Miss Beeks left the Zone the Government has furnished the negroes with blankets.

Beds are provided all American bachelors. Families of a year's residence on the Zone have not yet received their full quota of furniture. The assertion must be poor, Miss Beeks surmises, as furniture glued together would not be passed for points. Therefore the glued furniture falls to pieces in the second shower.

Bedbugs, fleas and cockroaches abound. Negro janitor service in the bachelors' quarters, she thinks, is mainly the cause of the vermin. The unpotable water makes many men drink too much tea at dinner and too much other stuff after dinner. A water and sewerage system has been planned for the entire length of the Zone, but it will be a year before all connections are made. There is plenty of water for bathing and drinking, but that used for drinking should be distilled.

The food seems fairly good, as a rule, but there is large room for improvement. The Dalmatians, Greeks and Spaniards have their favorite foods served. The West Indian negroes form a line and pass by a common kitchen, out of which the food is handed. Miss Beeks recommended that the Government promote farming in the Zone, where nearly everything can be raised. Secretary Taft has recommended the Agricultural Department to start a Government farm there.

The hospitals are well equipped. The principal ailments are malaria, typhoid and pneumonia. Quinine is offered to everybody every day at meal time.

Miss Beeks recommends the introduction of outdoor amusements for the employees. Life on the Isthmus should be made as attractive as possible.

Though schools have been established for the negroes at all the camps, schools for the whites have been started at only five of the seventeen camps. The standard is poor. There are plenty of churches, the liquor traffic is regulated, and the men, particularly the bachelors, are saving money.

THE SPREAD OF ESPERANTO

RECENTLY, in the university city of Cambridge, England, there was held a remarkable convention. hough the delegates came from widely parated parts of the globe, they were le to converse at once on varied topics interest, only now and then pausing r their minds to catch some word that d refused to come to their lips as soon needed. They were Esperantists, who d come to attend the great gatherg for the encouragement of the new ternational language, Esperanto. The nerable university gave them cordial lcome, and the inventor of the new ngue, Dr. Zamenhof, was received in e city as if he were a prince of a forgn State.

When he alighted at the railroad staon in Cambridge, the doctor found the atform decorated and crowded with adrers. The mayor, at the head of an ficial delegation, stepped forward to liver a speech of welcome. To the eat surprise of the mayor's townspeople, spoke in most excellent Esperanto. nen, surrounded by a guard of honor, mposed of the cavalry of the Legion of ontiersmen, Dr. Zamenhof was driven the university.

The Convention brought strongly to the telligent public the world over the great ides that have been made by the Espento tongue since its birthday, which its ventor places as December 5, 1878, ough the doctor's first pamphlet was t issued until nine years later.

The failure of a previous international ngue, Volapuk, retarded at first the read of Esperanto. Volapuk was exedingly hard to learn, and when once rned it was found to be of little pracal value, consequently people felt it uld be better to spend their time in rning some recognized tongue such as rman or French, if their own language s English. Esperanto, however, is as easy as Volapuk was difficult. The entire grammar of Esperanto can be learned in two hours. With some application a person can read any ordinary Esperanto text within a few weeks. In three months he can speak it fluently. It would take as many years, under ordinary conditions of school study, to do as much with any European tongue.

An American professor who attended the Congress was able, when he arrived, only to read some Esperanto text. Before he left for home, surrounded as he was by enthusiastic Esperantists who were jabbering in the new tongue, he found he was able to make himself understood, and comprehended perfectly the speeches made in Esperanto at the sessions of the Convention.

Greek and Latin, and the "commercial languages," English, French, German and Russian, were drawn upon by Dr. Zamenhof when he started the new language. It is a "root" language. He selected from these the "basic" words: words that have the same root, and which really only differ in prefixes and suffixes. Taking this root, he added simple prefixes and suffixes of his own that expressed the different shades of meaning. All nouns end in o, all adjectives in a. It has an alphabet of twenty-eight letters. Every letter has its own sound. Every word is pronounced as it is written, and there are no silent letters. There are no irregular verbs, and there are no exceptions to the rules of grammar. The irregular verbs are usually the great stumbling-block in the acquirement of a foreign language. How difficult our own must be for a foreigner will be seen when we realize that we use about two hundred irregular verbs in our daily speech. The average person will find about one-half of his vocabulary used as root words in Esperanto.

Dr. Zamenhof
Inventor of the New Language

The new language from its very simplicity has forced its way into great commercial schools and business houses. Recently the American Consul at Breslau wrote to our government at Washington to advise our merchants either to learn Esperanto or secure representatives with such knowledge if they desire to hold their foreign trade. It is being taught in commercial schools in England, France, Sweden, and Germany. The London Chamber of Commerce conducts examinations in Esperanto. There are many enthusiastic Esperantists in America, and there is an increasing demand for Esperanto books. Most of Shakespeare's works have been translated into the new tongue, as well as books of a religious nature, and many hymns.

Last August an entire service in St. Clement's Danish Church, in London, was conducted in Esperanto. Among the hymns sung were "Lord of our Life," and "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

Among the interesting figures at Cambridge was the French Marquis de Beaufront. For years the Marquis had been at work on a new international tongue that was to simplify the intercourse of nations. One day he happened to see one of the early pamphlets of Dr. Zamenhof. At once struck with its simplicity and practicability, he threw his own work aside, together with his own personal ambitions for the fame his success would bring him, and devoted his time to helping forward the Esperanto movement. His self-sacrifice has not been without its reward. Knowing his story, the delegates paid the Marquis every attention, and next to Dr. Zamenhof he was the most noted man at the Convention.

The first Esperanto Club in America was formed in Boston, in 1905. In a few days another was formed at the Perkins Institution for the Blind at South Boston. Esperantists in other States took it up, until now there is a large National Esperanto Association. The next Convention will be held in Germany next year, and in 1909 the Americans hope to get the Esperantists to hold their Convention here, as they feel it would do more than anything else to spread a knowledge among the American people.

A Book to be Enjoyed

I have just received the book, "The Great Heresies." Thank you for it. I know we shall enjoy it and be much benefited by it. Mary C. Bailey.

A CENTURY OF BIBLE DISTRIBUTION

THAT Nestor of Bible Societies in the United States—the Pennsylvania Bible Society—is making preparations to celebrate its one hundredth anniversary; and all the world of Bible-readers and Bible-lovers will turn with vivid interest to the event which commemorates the beginning of Bible distribution on the American continent. It may not be generally known that Pennsylvania boasts the earliest Bible society in the country. Other States followed, and in 1816 a national organization was effected under the title of The American Bible Society.

"The Bible Society of Philadelphia" was the original name of the Society, and Bibles with that title are still extant. When the Society was about thirty years old, its name was changed to the present one of the "Pennsylvania Bible Society." The work began in a small way. It was a small company of twenty-five clergymen and laymen who met by appointment in the home of Robert Ralston, one of their number, "for the purpose," thus described in the formal records, "of taking into consideration the propriety of instituting a Bible Society." Bishop Wm. White presided, and the ancient haircloth-covered chair in which he sat on that occasion is still in use in the Society's present quarters at 701 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

Prominent in the group was the venerable Dr. Benjamin Rush, who explained the object of the meeting and urged the importance of instituting a society for the gratuitous distribution of Bibles among the poor and ignorant.

There were ten clergymen of different denominations present—the Rev. Dr. Joseph Pilmore, the Rev. Archibald Alexander, the Rev. Thos Ware, the Rev. Philip T. Mayer, the Rev. Samuel Helffenstein, the Rev. Joseph Zesline, the Rev. Jacob J. Janeway, the Rev. Geo. C. Potts, the Rev. Dr. T. H. Helmuth, and the Rev. Mr. Bunn. The lay members of that charter meeting were Benjamin Rush, M.D., Robert Ralston, Peter Vanpelt, George Krebs, Lawrence Seckel, Wm. Shufflebottom, Francis Markol, Edward Pennington, John McMullen, J. Miller, Messrs. Haga, Hazard and Ritter, and Benjamin B. Hopkins.

A simple constitution was adopted by the group, and prefaced by an appropriate tribute to "the inestimable value of the revelation which it hath pleased God to make to our world, of his existence, character, will, works and grace in Jesus Christ, in the Bible, and of the great benefits to be expected from the distribution of it among persons who are unable to purchase it."

A provision of the constitution was that the Bible selected for publication or distribution should be without notes, and that copies of it in all the languages in which it is calculated to be useful should be distributed when deemed necessary by the Society. Great as may have been the anticipation of those early founders as to the work to be accomplished by the new-born Society, it is probable that none could then have thought that at the centennial of its birth the Society would be publishing and distributing Bibles in forty-five languages and at the average rate of four hundred copies a day.

Rev. Dr. Floyd Tomkins
Director of the Society

Bishop Ozi Whittaker
President, Pa. Bible Society

Bishop Cyrus D. Foss
Director of the Society

Arrangements were also made for the selection of a board of twenty-four managers, whose duty covered the making of by-laws for the government of the Society; correspondence with other Bible Societies; the keeping of accounts and the making of reports. Bishop White was elected president; The Rev. Dr. W. Stoughton, corresponding secretary; Benjamin B. Hopkins, recording secretary; and Robert Ralston, treasurer.

From the beginning the work was pre-eminently su cessful. In 1810 the Society was formally incorporate It later became affiliated with the American Bib Society, but it continued its work no less energetical throughout the State of Pennsylvania and in matte within its own sphere. No less than fifty local branch were formed for carrying on the work. Most importa was the Philadelphia branch, which distributed Bibl to the sick in hospitals, the prisoners in the penitentiarie the scholars in the mission schools, and the immigran at the docks. It also organized a work for the blin using the edition with raised letter James Moore, a sightless man, has bee the chief agent of this branch of th work. The Society has also done a fo eign missionary work at home. Ther are more than a million foreigners i Pennsylvania, chiefly employed in th coal and coke industries. The ten co porteurs employed by the Society pen etrate into the most remote regions o the State. Many eminent men hav been identified with the Society in th course of its history. The late Dr. Jame Morrow, traveler and Christian scholar served as general secretary from 188 to 1906, after a valuable preparatory experience of nearly twenty-one year in Ireland. John P. Rhoads, the treas urer for nearly half a century, wh passed away in 1905, did special work in the circulation of the Bible among th blind throughout the country. The pres ent head of the Society is Bishop O. W Whitaker, of the Episcopal Church. Among the vice presidents are Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, of the Methodis Church, and Dr. Floyd Tomkins, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Philadelphia. The general secretary is Rev Dr. Leighton W. Eckard, who has served as a missionary in northern China.

The approaching centenary of the Society is to be observed by the establishment of a fund for the carrying on of the important work. The sum aimed at is $60,000, and a large portion has already been secured. The plans for the celebration are in the hands of a committee of which Dr. Edward Yates Hill is chairman. They include a series of public meetings to be held next spring, in which clergymen of all denominations will participate.

stirring memories. Its old blockhouse still shows the marks where it was pierced for muskets. It bore many an attack from the mountain tribes in the old days, and after the British occupation the writer once saw a fight around the British cannon in the fortifications which replaced this old stockade. A band of Chinese insurgents with their Kachin allies crept down to the valley one Saturday night, when they knew that a body of artillery officers and men had just left by steamer for Mandalay. The men silently scaled the deep ditch, protected though it was with spiked bamboo, crept one by one over the muzzle of a gun, rushed the sentry and cut him down, and then rushed the guard tent, killing one man as he slept. Their next act was to set fire to the bamboo barracks in which Indian troops were sleeping, and to kill one or two men.

By this time an alarm had been given, and a young officer with a corporal's guard came doubling down, and soon killed two or three of the bold invaders, and turned the others out. Those killed and captured were all Chinese. REV. F. A. STEVEN.

[Missionary work in Burma has made marked progress in recent years. There are seminaries, theological training schools and Bible schools at Mandalay, Moulmein, Pegu, and Rangoon; industrial schools at Bassein, Thayetmyo, and Toungoo; mission publishing houses at Rangoon and Toungoo; there are hospitals at Bassein, Bhamo, Mone, Moulmein, Namkham, Sagaing, Thibaw, and Toungoo; orphanages at Mone, Thandang, and Toungoo; homes for lepers at Mandalay and Moulmein; reading rooms and Sunday Schools at Bassein, Pegu and Rangoon; besides various other organizations for Christian and philanthropic work at different places. The first Protestant missions were planted in Burma in 1807 by English Baptist missionaries. Mandalay, the capital, is a most picturesque city, with innumerable pagodas. Its population of some 200,000 includes, besides Burmese proper, representatives of the clans of India, Siam, Malacca and Tonquin, and thousands of Asiatics; islanders from Melanesia and Polynesia; Europeans, Eurasians, and a fair sprinkling of Americans. The country, as a whole, is one of the most inviting fields for missionary work in all Asia.]

A Strange Funeral Pyre

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A. C. H. "I wish to acknowledge the many prayers I have had answered. I will never cease to love Him."

Reader, New York. "For many answers to prayer I give public thanks, and especially for one recently which has given me great happiness and courage."

One Who Has Been Helped, Ohio. "I prayed earnestly for a loved one whose sorrow was so great as to take away the desire to live. I payed without ceasing that this one might be lifted up and saved from a fate worse than the death craved. God answered me, and I want to acknowledge to the world his love and power."

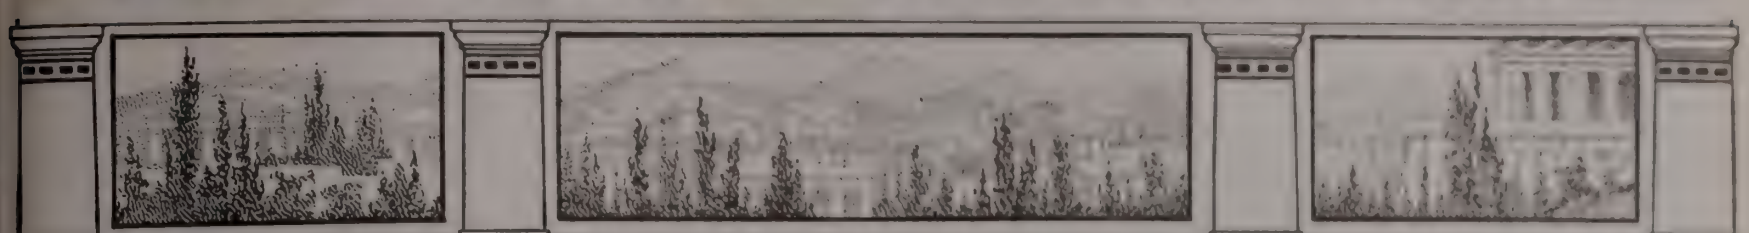
M. C., Indiana. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering my prayers when I was in great trouble. Prayer has done wonderful things for me. It has caused reconciliation between estranged members of our family; restored dear ones to health; kept my sisters from going astray, and restored my own health when I had almost despaired of being well again."

E. E. C., South Carolina. "I am glad to say that God answers prayer. When my loved ones were sick God heard my prayer."

Reader, Virginia. "God answers prayer, even when the poor, doubting, despairing sinner for sixty-five years has feared the case beyond the reach of hope. This testimony is given in the hope, and with the prayer, that some one, listening to the voice of the devil instead of Jesus' plain words, may be induced to pray on, believing the answer will come."

E. H. J., Pennsylvania. "I want to add my testimony that God has heard and answered my poor prayers since I was a child. I am now seventy-six years old. I have often been in great trouble and could not see my way clear. Then I have gone to his Word seeking guidance and help, and he has not disappointed me."

IN PLEASANT AUTUMN DAYS



True and False Frugality

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SEVERAL weeks ago the readers of this page were presented with a succession of letters from correspondents who have shown themselves able to live comfortably on a limited income. Most of these letters told a story of great self-denial, of praiseworthy thrift and of what Emerson called plain living and high thinking. But there are always two sides to the shield, and the fair-minded person willing to admit this is not reluctant to consider what may be styled economy wrong side out. Is there not just a little danger that good people and naturally generous people may form habits of saving that become gradually so fixed that the end is lost sight of and the means are glorified? For example, one may so give his attention to accumulating that he cannot bear to see the spending of a superfluous penny, even for pleasure that is innocent and legitimate, or for the bestowal of gifts on loved ones. A case in point arises in memory.

In a certain city, perhaps forty years ago, dwelt a young couple who had started with a capital of health and energy, honesty and industry. As for money, they were scantily supplied with that, but the husband was a diligent worker, and the wife a fine manager. In common with those who have written to us, they wasted nothing and made the most of all they had. The wife conceived the idea on December that a year from then she would give her husband a small gold chain for his watch. They had not exchanged Christmas or birthday presents since their marriage, and the home was childless. The fund in the bank was growing larger, and both worked steadily and lived thriftily with no margin for sentiment.

The jeweler told me the story after death had separated the two. He said that three months before Christmas Mrs. Blank came to his shop and selected a present for her husband, asking him not to sell it as she had nearly enough money saved to pay its price, begging also that he would on no account divulge the secret to her husband. He thought there was little danger of that, as the husband and he seldom met, but he gave the promise and kept it.

A few days before Christmas Mrs. Blank came for the little chain and poured out its price upon the counter in pennies, small silver half dimes and occasional dimes. They told the story of her loving self-denial as it could not have been told in words. She carried the present away with a radiant face. The day after Christmas she came drooping in, looking meagre and pinched, all the beautiful light gone out of her face. "Enoch said I was to bring it back," she said, "and ask you to return the money. He says he never knew such foolishness." Was it any wonder that this poor little starved life did not linger very long with her churl of a husband?

A letter received too late to be used when we were comparing notes on this topic, is so pertinent that it is inserted here. No injustice is intended to our former correspondent who made good his point and who probably does not find any less happiness in his home because of adhering steadfastly to a rule to which his wife agrees as fair and right. Probably both are looking forward to the future of their child's education. But another phase is opened in this letter:

The subject discussed in your paper on how to live wisely and comfortably on the limited income of $500 per year is of great interest to me. My attention was particularly attracted to a letter which appeared in the issue of July 10. The correspondent states that he has an assured income of $1,000 per year for five years. Already has $4,000 in the bank. Has a wife and baby boy. His ideas of economy and living within the stated allotment are, in a general way, in accordance with my own, but we differ decidedly in regard to some things.

Why should an able-bodied man, with every prospect of work for the future, and an assured income of $1,000 for five years, cut his present rate of expenditure down to $500 per year? After the high rent, charities, food and simplest clothing are paid, what is left for home comforts?

A bank account for future use and the rainy day that may come is indeed a most prudent thing, but how about the present days? We pass this way but once—why not put a little wholesome enjoyment into the life that we live each day? Not in a reckless, extravagant way, but why not sometimes omit the daily question, "Is it necessary or wise?" Wouldn't it be wise for a man occasionally to bring to his wife a bunch of roses, or some special treat?

And the baby boy! He will wax fat and grow strong without one useless toy, but wouldn't a five-cent toy help to develop his inquiring mind and give him heaps of childish joy, compared with the five cents put at interest in the bank? Perhaps before the interest on it would accumulate, the boy may be laid aside, where even a bank account will be of no value to him.

I have heard of cases where the wife gave the strength of her young life for the sake of the bank account, and later the second wife lived on the fruits of her labors.

Personally, I believe that one-tenth of one's income should belong to the Lord's work, so I would first take $100 to be used for church and charitable purposes, and then divide out the remaining amount for my own use. In the case of one who does not figure on that basis, I would suggest the putting aside of $300, and leaving a margin of $200 to be expended on wholesome enjoyment.

False economy is almost as bad as extravagance. L. B. R.

In a consideration of the future, it should never be forgotten that a day of trouble may dawn, in which a large inroad must be made on the carefully saved sum in bank. The subject is a big one and to-day presents itself in a new and very interesting aspect.

ON THE CORNWALL COAST

NO part of all the seacoast of England has more charm for artist and tourist than the part on the southwest that stretches out into the sea until it reaches the famous cliff of Land's End. The people, far from the metropolis, have maintained many of their medieval customs and ancient ways of living. They tinker their boats and clean their fish as did their fathers before them in the days of "King Harry," and when the French pirates were unwelcome visitors to their shores. These fisher-folk are almost as quaint as the Breton peasants who dwell just across the turbulent channel that divides Cornwall from the sunny land of France. The picture was painted by Walter Langley.

Bachelor Entertaining

MODERN conveniences in city life are, we fear, making bachelors much too comfortable. Formerly a man who was unmarried missed the comforts of a home if he had not a mother and sisters or a maiden aunt to look after his dinners and his clothing. At present a single man may live luxuriously in an apartment house given over to men like himself, each suite having living room, bed-room and bath-room at least; while for those who are willing to pay liberally, ampler accommodations are provided with everything needed for the entertainment of guests. Such apartment houses are fully equipped with restaurants and dining rooms where excellent meals may be had, and if the man have not a personal attendant it is easy for him to secure the services not only of a laundress, but of a visiting housekeeper, who will carefully brush his clothing, protect it from moths and mend whatever part of his apparel is in need of a stitch. The facts in the case are that bachelors may live at a much less cost than married men, in great ease and comfort, and that they, therefore, forego the pleasure of a home and the dignity of the married estate, without one thought of fear concerning a lonely old age.

When a bachelor wishes to entertain friends of the other sex, he calls to his aid a married lady, and asks her to chaperone his reception or tea. She willingly consents, and gives him the benefit of her advice about the details of the affair. The decorations of the rooms, the provision of laying off outer wraps and the menu are matters on which he probably consults madame, and she arrives early that she may assist him in receiving. It is perfectly comme il faut that a bachelor should invite any number of young people, beautiful girls inclusive, if a married lady take the affair under her wing. For the entertainment of his guests he need give himself no anxiety beyond that of any other host, as guests usually entertain one another. A little music is always desirable, but pleasant times can be had without it.

The Style of the Bible

The Bible is not a single book, but a unique collection of books, the production of which occupied many centuries. The authors represented therein are drawn from every class in society—from kings and noblemen, priests and scribes, to herdsmen, tax gatherers and fishermen. The question often comes to mind when reading a marvelous chapter, as for instance the second in the first epistle of Peter, whence came this pointed rhetoric, whence this admirably eloquent style? Who taught the rough fishermen of the Galilean lake to write sentences of matchless music, strong, universal, and convincing? Who gave to Amos the herdsman of Tekoa his simplicity and force, and his exquisite symmetry and lucent atmosphere? In all literature there is nothing so dramatic as the book of Job, nothing fuller of earthly wisdom than the book of Proverbs, nothing more versatile and more fitted to every mood than the book of Psalms.

Each of these little books, combined in this one great volume, is a masterpiece of matter and style. Whence did it originate, this classic perfection? Whence, if not in heaven itself?

A Large and Handsome Volume

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The book, "Great Homes," received with thanks. I had no idea it was so large. I shall, no doubt, enjoy it greatly.

New Haven, Conn. MRS. JOHN BRADLEY.

Questions and Answers

A. E., Lorain, O. I notice that certain ministers are proclaiming against the growing "affinity" evil. Are they right?

Decidedly yes. It is the duty of a preacher of the Gospel to denounce any evil that would sully the home or that makes war on marriage, honor and virtue. The so-called "affinity" evil is simply the latest form of free love. It should be denounced from every pulpit.

F. L. G., Philadelphia. What does Isa. 4:1 mean?

The passage referred to—"In that day, seven women shall take hold of one man"—means that in the calamitous period described in the preceding chapter, so many men would be slain that the women would greatly outnumber the survivors. "Seven" is the typical number, and its use here means that the number of the women would be vast and indefinite. According to the Jewish law, it was a reproach for a woman to be unwedded and childless, and the women in question would be eager to escape this reproach if possible.

H. K., Kansas. What was the Kitchen Cabinet?

It was a term applied to certain political advisers to President Jackson. It was so-called because it was "devoid of the public dignity pertaining to the cabinet, and entirely separate from the cabinet proper."

G. S. W., Ferriday, La. Is there any way of reconciling the various dates assigned to the Creation? Are we now living in the year 5668, as the Jews say, or 5911, as Ussher says?

There is no way of reconciling the dates. Neither the Jews nor Ussher, nor any one else, can tell us the date of the Creation. The mode of reckoning time in the early ages of the world is unknown to us. It is probable that Solomon began to reign in the year 1015, and from that time to this the reckoning is straight, but earlier than Solomon every calculation is futile.

J. B. W., Birmingham, Ala. How is Moody's work going on in Chicago? We know about the Northfield work, but little of Chicago.

It is growing year by year. The secretary reports that the Bible Institute (for 1906-7) has had 305 enrolled students, a total attendance of 10,421 at Bible classes. The students represented 14 Protestant denominations and came from 26 States. Of the men who left during the year 18 are in mission work, 24 are pastors' assistants and in charge of smaller churches, 7 are evangelists and 8 evangelistic singers, 29 are continuing or have resumed their studies in other colleges or seminaries. Of the women 10 are pastors' assistants, 9 are pastors' wives, 15 have gone to the foreign field, 13 are in home and city missions, 5 are evangelistic singers. From the beginning of the work up to the present time about 450 have gone to foreign fields, several of whom have died martyrs' deaths.

H. D. A., Garden City, N. Y. What was the date of Israel's leaving Egypt?

Ussher's chronology, used in the margins of old-fashioned Bibles, gives it as 1491 B. C. But that cannot be correct, as Menephtah, under whom the exodus is believed to have taken place, was not alive at that early date. Brugsch, who probably knows more of Egyptian history than any other scholar, places the date of the exodus at 1300 B. C. Breasted, the most recent historian, does not give the date, but says that Menephtah died in 1215, which would indicate 1225 as about the time of the exodus.

C. S., Plainfield, N. J. Who was the Man in the Iron Mask?

It is a question that has long puzzled historians. He first appeared as a prisoner and wearing the iron mask at Pignerol, France, in 1679. He was transferred several times to various forts and prisons. He died in the Bastile November 19, 1703. He was of noble bearing and was treated with great respect, but his keepers had orders to kill him if he removed the mask. All who came into his presence were required to uncover and to stand. Several conjectures have been made as to his identity. The Duke de Vermandois, son of Louis XIV., who was reported to have perished in the camp before Dixmode; the Duke of Beaufort, reported beheaded before Candia; a twin brother of Louis XIV.; James, Duke of Monmouth, beheaded on Tower Hill, London; the statesman Fouquet and Count Matthioli, secretary to Charles III., Duke of Mantua. Several investigators believe strongly that the last was the prisoner. The mask was of velvet strengthened with whalebone.

H. G., Utica, N. Y. What does the word "grocer" come from?

It originally meant engrossers, or monopolizers. They are so called in a law passed in England in 1363, during the reign of Edward III. The Grocers' Company, one of the twelve great companies in London, was established in 1345.

L. de W., Sargent, Mo. Where can I get the Book of Enoch? Can I buy it in English, German or Dutch? What does it contain?

The only Scriptural reference to the Book of Enoch is that found in Jude, verses 14 and 15, but it is not known whether Jude derived his quotation from the written book itself or from tradition. Several of the early fathers of the Church mention the "writings" and "books" of Enoch as though there were several productions. Justin, Irenæus, Anatolius, Clement and Origen all make such mention, and Tertullian quotes the book as one which was not admitted into the Jewish Canon. It seems to have been known as late as the eighth and ninth centuries, and then all trace was lost until three manuscript copies of an Ethiopic translation were brought to England by Bruce from Abyssinia in 1773. It has since been translated into English, French and German. The book consists of a series of revelations given to Enoch and Noah. In the fourth part of the book the Messiah is predicted and the final redemption of the world. It should be added that the ablest scholars agree that the composition of the book could not have been earlier than a century before Christ and possibly only half a century. Dillmann assigns the chief part of it to some Aramæan writer about 110 B.C., and believes it was greatly added to by translators afterward. Macmillans or Nelson Sons can probably procure it for you.

Dedication of the McKinley Memorial

IN the presence of over a hundred thousand people, including the President of the United States and the Governors of many States, the beautiful memorial tomb in which rests the body of the late President McKinley was formally dedicated on the last day of September, in Canton, O. The city was decorated in a way that has been seldom equaled. The school children formed a great American flag, singing as President Roosevelt drove by. There was a fine display of troops, the city of Cleveland sending the cavalry escort, and Atlanta, Ga., the Gate City Guard. The crowd at the memorial was so large that it extended far beyond the range of the voices of the orators of the day.

L., Sulphur Springs, Tex. What do you think about the United States and Japan going to war?

There is not the slightest danger, nor has there ever been any real danger, of war. All the talk to that effect is merely alarmist rumor. The California incident has been satisfactorily adjusted, and even if this were not the case, that incident loses its significance in view of the anti-Japanese troubles in Vancouver, B. C. Our navy goes to the Pacific, but it has never been the intention of the administration to send it to Japanese waters. Our Secretary of War, Mr Taft, who is now in Japan, finds the best of feeling prevailing there toward our people and our country.

Mrs. J. B., Weston, Ill. Do you think it will be many more years before Christ returns to the earth? Would we not hail him with joy?

All human calculations and opinions on the subject are worthless. Christ himself said of it: "Of that day and hour knowet no man; no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." It is the duty of Christians to watch for it, pray for it, work for it, and be ever in readiness for it. We believe there are many in this expectant attitude to-day, although the world, as a whole, is indifferent.

Miscellaneous

W. H., Pittsburg, Pa. President Roosevelt has a knowledge of German, though we do not know if he ever delivered a speech in that language.

The extract entitled "The Cripple's Garden," which appeared in our issue of Oct. 2, was from the graceful pen of Ada Sheldon, and should have been so credited.

G. H., Bad Axe, Mich. A theatre is surely the last place where one would expect to see the life of Christ depicted. Yet, though it seems out of place, good may come of it, and we would not criticize.

F. W. H., Jefferson, Wis. Our national song is "America." We believe that practically all of the men mentioned in your list were or are Christians, but we have no direct information as to their religious affiliations.

F. K. B., Sanderton, Pa. There is no place in New York where one subway runs under another for any distance. There is a point below City Hall where the local trains pass beneath the express trains, and there are places on the main line where the express tracks sink almost a car's depth below the local tracks at the sides, but in the latter case one is not directly over the other. We are unable to answer the question in regard to the boilers; write to some manufacturer. Pennsylvania and Texas are two of the greatest oil producing States.

Pleased with the Premiums

I received "The Pilgrim's Progress," which you so kindly sent me, and also a handsome picture of "Washington's triumphal entry into New York." I thank you very much for your generosity.

GABRIELLE

THE FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE

By ISABELLA MACFARLANE

HE banquet was to be held at high noon, just after the presentation of the "fat calf."

As the morning advanced, the ited guests began to make their appearce.

The Governor himself arrived on horsek, accompanied by his son, Jacob isler, Jr., who was popularly believed be an aspirant for the hand of "the ower of New Rochelle," as his visits l lately been quite frequent. Many ers, chiefly French, came from New rk, some on invitation, others from crest or curiosity. Gabrielle had ined her Albany friends, Mr. and Mrs. ilip Van Buskirk, but received for swer that, Philip having been taken o partnership with his father-in-law conducting the Golden Horse, it was possible for him to leave at that time, ing to the great influx of guests.

Needless to say, Mr. Guisebert Van unt was not invited.

There was no one who enjoyed the casion more than Cousin Roger Bonne-. (Roger had dropped the aristotic "de" from his name, but David l his family retained it.) He was oud of having been the first settler in place, and the actual sponsor of New chelle, he having given it its name. made it his business to accost all sangers, and point out to them, in fable language and with much gesticuon, the attractions of the place. He wed them the little "house of wood" s own) which was the first build- erected there—the rocky point on ich the colonists first landed, and ich resembled in some of its features rock that gave La Rochelle its name. showed the cave in the side of the k, still known as "the fire-place," ch had been for months the common king and warming place of the ugees. He pointed out Leisler's Mill, ly erected by the enterprising gov-or, and the spring adjoining, which plied the village with excellent water.

Another of our characters took a great rest in the affair, and derived much oyment from it. This was the cheer- old lady who had romped on her ty-fourth birthday, and who still, ugh now nearly a nonagenarian, kept self young by taking an interest in things that were happening around She did not intend to sit down to banquet; that would have been too h for her. But she walked all und the tables, supported on one side her favorite Raoul, and on the other the prized relic, the gold-headed king-stick of the illustrious Prince Condé, given by him to her grandher.

"Why, Raoul," said she, as she looked the loaded tables, "there is enough e to have fed the starving people of Rochelle for a week, during Richeli's siege."

"May be so," answered Raoul, "but I bt if there will be much of it left n we get through. I am hungry ally. I wish the sun would reach the n mark."

Gabrielle was in the kitchen, putting finishing touches to a delicacy which thought required her personal attenn, when Phillis, the negro slave-girl, red hastily, looking excited.

"Miss Gabrielle, dey's two gen'lemen e parlor, and dey wants to see you."

"Two gentlemen? Oh, why do people e calls at such unseasonable hours? nnot go and leave this."

"Yes, yes, dearie, you go on. Old istine will attend to it."

Gabrielle threw off her apron, flicked w specks of flour from her sleeves, went to receive her guests.

As she opened the door, a man stepped ward, and the next moment she was he arms of Louis Marquand.

"O Louis! Louis! Louis!" was all she could say.

The other visitor remained in the background, and turned his face to the window, perhaps from delicacy, perhaps to hide his emotion.

But Gabrielle had seen and recognized him as she entered the door, and as soon as she could extricate herself from Louis' embrace, she turned to him.

"Captain Girard! This is a surprise! By what strange turn of fortune do I find you and Louis Marquand together?"

Before he could reply, Louis answered for him.

"We have been together for four or five years—first in the galleys, and then as slaves on a plantation."

"Then it was true, the story I heard of his being sent to the galleys for befriending me?"

"Yes. He was arrested for helping you to escape."

"Alas! was I the cause of so much misery?"

"By a strange coincidence," continued Louis, "we were both chained to the same rowing-bench. There we toiled and suffered together. We became comrades, friends, brothers. And when, a few months ago, he obtained his pardon, he refused to avail himself of it until he could procure my liberty also. Gabrielle, it is entirely through the generosity of this noble man that you see me here to-day."

"Yes, Gabrielle," said Girard, speaking for the first time, "It is I—I—Francis Girard—who have brought your lover to your arms. Have I not conquered?" with an expressive look which she well understood, and in which she saw (though he did not know it) that, notwithstanding his boasted self-conquest, he loved her still.

For answer, she stepped up to him, and taking his hand in hers, raised it to her lips. It was an act of homage.

"Yes! you have indeed conquered! You are a hero!" she said, with faltering voice and eyes swimming in tears.

And ah! how soothing were those words of commendation from her to his bruised and still quivering heart!

Louis then told her of some other incidents of their captivity, and received in return information as to what had occurred in his absence.

It was a great blow to him to learn that his father was no more.

"The dear old man! It was one of my sweetest anticipations during the long sea-voyage, the witnessing of his joy at my return. But God had ordered otherwise."

By this time the word had spread through the house that Louis Marquand had come, and the whole family flocked into the room to bid him welcome.

CHAPTER XXV

Conclusion

THE hour appointed for the presentation of the calf had arrived.

A large arm-chair had been placed under a spreading tree, one of the original monarchs of the wood, which had been spared at the clearing. On this the Governor took his seat.

The prominent men of the colony, among whom were numbered our friends Roger and David de Bonnefoy, stood immediately in front of him, while a little removed from them were ranged the whole of the inhabitants of the village and the visitors, anxious to witness the interesting ceremony.

The day was propitious; a soft breeze tempered the heat of the June sun, and the lapping of the sparkling waters of the Sound made a pleasant melody.

At a signal, the calf was led into the circle by a boy, and proud and happy was the boy to whom had been accorded this honor and privilege.

As a general thing, a calf is not an imposing animal. There is a lumpish and immature look about him that detracts from his dignity, as compared with the full-grown ox, such as the "bœuf gras" of the Parisian Mardi Gras. Yet in this particular calf, fattened to a high degree of corpulency—his sleek sides shining in the sunshine like satin, and his beauty further enhanced by a garland of flowers about his neck—there was much to attract the attention of the hundreds of eyes directed to him.

The presentation speech was made by Dr. de Neufville, an intelligent and cultured physician, who had lately settled in the place.

He thanked the governor for his services in obtaining for the colonists such favorable terms from the lord of the Manor of Pelham, and for his continued kindness in many instances since—such as the erection of a mill, which enabled them to grind their wheat and other grain without the trouble of carrying them a long distance for the purpose; also the gift of a spring of delicious water, which gift, he doubted not, would perpetuate the name of the donor to future times, as it was known throughout the community as "Leisler's Spring"—with much more to the same effect.

He then presented the calf, as a tribute from all the landholders of the settlement, which, he said, they had tried to make as worthy of the governor's acceptance as possible.

Governor Leisler replied in a few kindly words, thanking the people for their good will, and accepting the calf with hearty commendation of its fine condition.

And the ceremony was over.

The next in order was the banquet.

Promptly as the sun reached the noon-mark, a horn sounded long and loud, calling the guests to the tables. The clambake was opened, and Tony and his dusky attendant stood ready to exhume its appetizing contents, and set them before the company.

The benches ranged along the tables were quickly filled, and the viands disappeared with astonishing celerity, most of the guests being very hungry, having been afoot since daybreak.

But the work before them was not so absorbing but that the two strangers who sat with the de Bonnefoy family attracted much attention, and the questions passed from lip to lip: "Who are they? Where do they come from?" To which was added: "What fine-looking men they are!" For both men had during the long sea-voyage recovered their good looks. Francis, in particular, though in plain clothes, was noticeable for his fine erect figure and military bearing.

At length some one, who had known Louis in La Rochelle, recognized him.

"I know that one who sits next to Miss Gabrielle. He is Louis Marquand, son of old Pastor Marquand, who used to preach in our old temple. He has been a galley-slave for conscience' sake, and having escaped, has come here, no doubt, to marry the Flower of New Rochelle, to whom he was affianced before his captivity."

"Ah!" said the neighbor, "then that is the reason she was always so cold and indifferent to our gallants here—even to the governor's son."

"But," said another gossip, "he will be apt to find a rival in the other gentleman, who, to my certain knowledge, is a captain in the French army, and was sent to the galleys for befriending Miss Gabrielle. He is the son of a rich lady, and in my opinion has the better chance of the two."

The banquet over, the company left their seats, and scattered themselves about the grounds. Some sat down on the greensward; some stood around in groups, conversing; some strolled about, viewing the beauties of the place, the pretty islands that lay before it, and the wooded shores of Long Island seen dimly in the distance.

The tables, with the abundant remains of the feast, were then given up to the Indians, the negroes, and all the underlings who had assisted in the work. As the reader may imagine, a scene of considerable disorder ensued.

At a little distance from the tables stood a group, consisting of Louis and Francis, Gabrielle and her father, engaged in conversation.

"Do you intend, Captain Girard," said David, "to cast in your lot with us, and take up your abode in our little settlement?"

"Oh, no. I intend to return to France as soon as possible. It is there my duty calls me. My only errand here was to bring my friend Louis," with a glance at Gabrielle, who replied with a grateful smile.

"My daughter has told me how much we all owe to you, captain, and I beg you to accept my most hearty thanks."

The Captain bowed without speaking.

"How did you find us out?" inquired David.

"We arrived about a week ago in New York, and made inquiry for you among the French inhabitants of that city. After much research, we found a man who knew you, and he directed us to this place."

"And the very name—New Rochelle—" said Louis, "warmed my heart, and made me almost feel that I was coming back to the home of my boyhood."

"When you return to France, captain, will you remain in the army?" inquired David.

"I have laid my plans as to what I shall do when I return to France. I shall first visit my mother at our Château of Belvoisin. Then I shall rejoin the army. But I shall never again take part in the persecution of the Huguenots. 'Although I do not belong to 'the Religion,' I shall always respect it, for the sake of those who practice it. And perhaps, some time, when I am old and have been retired from the army, I may come out here to visit you, my friends. But we do not know what is in the future."

Here a pretty rosy-cheeked young woman drew near the group, and looked shyly in Girard's face as if asking recognition.

"As I live," he exclaimed, "here is the pretty wild-rose girl of the Rosière festival! She, also, in America?"

"She is not a girl now,"—she is my wife!" said Raoul, boldly.

At this they all laughed, for their hearts were light, and little things amused them.

But at this moment there arose a fearful noise and clamor from the direction of the half-dismantled tables. The cause of it was but too apparent. Through some negligence or oversight on the part of those in charge, the Indians had gained access to some brandy, had drunk it, and become, for the time, raving mad. Led by Tony, they yelled, they shouted, they fought with each other and the negroes, they leaped on the tables, smashing everything, they danced their wild dances, and performed other frantic acts, impossible to describe.

Some attempts were made to pacify them, but without much effect. Tony was so strong and so furious, it was dangerous to approach him.

When the uproar was at the highest, an Indian, who had been hunting in the neighboring woods, came into the enclosure, a gun on his shoulder, and some dead game in his hands.

The moment Tony saw him, he flew at him, and wrenched the gun from his hands. He capered around with it for some time, endangering the lives of many; then, suddenly standing still, he

A GEORGIA WOMAN'S WORK

OME people have the happy faculty of devising great things and carrying them to successful conclusion thout much apparent effort. Under eir guiding hands small movements em to grow naturally until they are of tional importance. To this class belongs rs. Eugene B. Heard, Superintendent the Model School at the Jamestown position, and a member of the Honorary visory Board of the Exposition. She is erested in more than one philanthropy. e is best known for her library work. . Heard is in charge of the Seaboard Line System of Free Traveling Libra-, a system which she herself originated. he books of this system are carried six States, Virginia, North Carolina, th Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and bama. Besides the distribution of ks, other good works are carried on in nection with the libraries, such as the motion of the arts and crafts move-t, village improvement work, home arts and industries, and an attempt to revive ante-bellum industries among colored folks.

Mrs. Eugene B. Heard

It is entirely a labor of love. She accepts no remuneration for her time. She says: "I am grateful for the opportunity to labor in this capacity for my countrymen and countrywomen.

The report of the work the past year showed forty-five towns and rural communities on the list of library stations; one hundred rural schools visited by libraries; twenty-eight thousand children readers of the books; 2,974 magazines and periodicals circulated among factory employees; and a number of libraries placed at stations under the charge of station agents for the use of the traveling public.

Mrs. Heard was born and brought up in a college town, where books were to be procured without difficulty. She married when quite young, and went to live on a cotton plantation in Georgia. It was a lonely country, the nearest railroad being thirty-five miles away.

The many deprivations suffered by those living in such isolated regions made a deep impression upon her. Knowing the helpful influence of books, she commenced lending her collection of religious volumes. Gradually the work grew, receiving its strongest impetus under saddest circumstances, the death of an only son eighteen years ago. The son's little library was added to the lending books. When several years ago the Seaboard Air Line Railroad proposed co-ordination of forces, Mrs. Heard readily acquiesced, feeling that transportation was the chief thing needed to make her work a success.

A glimpse into her office at her country home at Middleton shows bookcases packed and ready to start on their mission of mercy.

In one corner of the room is the century-old trunk of a red cedar tree. On it is the happy motto: "Who never do anything more than they are paid for, never get paid for any more than they do."

blow from the fist of the stalwart Englishman, Walter Browne, stretched the assassin on the ground, where several men sat on him, and bound him hand and foot; while friendly hands took up his victim, and bore him to the residence of David de Bonnefoy, by his directions.

Such was the tragedy that marked the first celebration of the festival of the "fat calf"—a celebration which, tradition tells us, was kept up for many years, until the progress of modern ideas eliminated from American usage that and other relics of the feudal system.

The event cast a gloom over the whole community, for though the slain man was known but to a very few, the circumstances of his death were so touching, that they awakened an interest in every heart.

They buried him in the little cemetery, and Louis placed a stone to his memory inscribed with the single word: "Girard."

And there, in after years, Gabrielle would often go with her children, and while they strewed flowers on the grave, would tell them what he who lay beneath had done for their father and for herself.

ALABASTINE

How to Beautify Your Home

Make the walls beautiful, and you increase the attractiveness of the entire home. Make them sanitary and you increase the healthfulness of the home.

You can do both of these things by decorating your home with Alabastine. The expense is actually less than the cost of wall-paper or kalsomine; the effects are superior and the sanitation is far better.

Alabastine

The Sanitary Wall Coating

can be easily applied to any wall by anyone. It is made in sixteen tints and white. These can be combined into an endless variety of shades, thus making each room different, while all are in harmony. One tint can be applied over another tint of Alabastine without washing or scraping the walls, thus doing away with the dirt and fuss incident to other wall decorating materials.

A wall tinted with Alabastine offers no breeding place for insects or germs, and a room decorated with Alabastine is therefore perfectly sanitary.

Alabastine is sold in carefully sealed and properly labeled packages by all paint and oil, drug, hardware and general stores, at 50c the package for white, 55c for tints. A package will cover from 300 to 450 square feet, according to the nature of the surface.

Send 10 cents for the book "Dainty Wall Decorations," showing many beautiful color plans for home decoration; or write for sample tint cards of Alabastine, sent free on request.

The Saxon, New York, Nov. 4, '05.
Messrs. KIRTLAND Bros. & Co.

Gentlemen: I feel with me on my recent European trip one of your Excelsior Solar Telescopes, with which I had the pleasure of observing an eclipse of the sun. At the Austrian Exhibit was almost 80 per cent. concealed. Your Solar Eye Piece is a great thing. Its value to me on this occasion was many times greater than the entire outfit for the Telescope.

Yours truly, L. S. HENRY.

Count Cattle 20 Miles Away

I wish all to know how satisfactory the Excelsior Telescope is. Our farm is on the highest point in the surrounding country, one mile south of the junction of Wilson and Arkansas rivers. From our gin we can see with the aid of the Telescope, over into the Kansas Indian Reservation, nearly 20 miles, count the cattle and tell a horse from a cow, can see a house ranch 17 miles west that cannot be seen with the naked eye, can see the cobble and count windows with the Telescope. Again thanking you all for a square deal, I remain,

Missions in Europe*

HOW far the nations of Europe are from the Kingdom of Christ, is a question that cannot be answered without gloom and depression. They can, however, scarcely be regarded as a sphere of foreign missions. Perhaps Turkey approaches nearest to our idea of that sphere than other nations, and in that land, amid many discouragements, American missionaries have toiled long and faithfully. There is need of mission work of another kind in Russia, Spain, Italy, and even in France, for in all those lands there is deplorable ignorance of the truth as we understand it. But we can imagine the indignation of the Frenchman and the Spainard at the proposal to send a missionary into his country as if he were a heathen. England is nominally Christian, but there must be millions of her people who have no experimental knowledge of the truth. But we have no right to set ourselves on a pedestal to examine and criticise other people, for we have within our own borders a larger proportion of non-Christian citizens.

Dr. A. Schreiber, of Barmen, Germany, gave us a hint of this wounded feeling in an address he delivered during a visit here. He said, "There has been an old wish with us in Germany that all missionary boards in England as well as in America, might be good enough to make a clear distinction between proper mission work among the heathen and evangelical work among Italians and in Spain and Austria and other parts of Europe. We do not oppose such work in the least, but what we are a little afraid of is that by mixing these things up, by and by you will go so far that you will consider also the whole of Germany as heathen country." We defeat our purposes when we arouse national prejudice by arrogantly presuming to send foreign missionaries to a nominally Christian country.

We are far from saying that Christian work is not needed in Europe. The beautiful and successful work that Dr. McAll did in Paris in the early seventies shows how sorely needed and how beneficent such work is. Christian men and women who have spent a summer in Italy or Spain tell us how gladly the people listened to the preaching of the Gospel, while in Russia, the evangelist finds willing audiences of men and women who, while calling themselves Christians, were amazed as they listened to the story of free salvation through Christ.

Foundation and Purpose of the Church†

DURING those forty days in the desert, the mind of Christ, intent on the work before him, must have dwelt in deep study on the method of its performance. How should he singly and alone do that which it was given him to do? There was he, unknown to the world, without wealth or influence, with the task before him of winning the race to God. It must have appeared to him a stupendous undertaking. The divine power, of which he was even then undoubtedly conscious, might, as was suggested to him, be used to startle men. To fling himself down from the giddy height of the temple's pinnacle would cause wonder at his escape from death. That would advertise him, but he shrank from such methods. He must in that solitude have conceived the idea of the Church. His personal sacrifice would be accomplished in a few short years, but it would be vain, if its meaning was not disclosed to mankind. To leave behind him a body of men, imbued with his spirit, devoted to him and his purpose, who should declare him and inspire others with like devotion, that was the means he chose.

His personal work, his life of self-sacrifice, his teaching and his death on the cross were the beginning the rock on which he would build his Church, the foundation without which there could be no building. Right well did he lay that foundation by his patience, his gentleness, his love and his suffering. That done, his followers who had been with him and observed him had something definite to declare to the world. Poor, uneducated men, they went forth preaching him and winning hearers by the intrinsic grandeur of their message. It laid hold on men as mere eloquence and learning could never have done. They preached Christ and nothing else. In so far they fulfilled the purpose of their calling. Men heard and believed.

Thus the Church gradually rose on that foundation of his life and death. He had decided wisely. Within fifty years of his death, his work was known through the nations. Men were devoted to him, and when persecution came they were scattered far and wide carrying the Gospel with them. So each generation furnished new stones to the building of the Church. It rose gradually and it halted only when wealth and power sought to help it with worldly influence. It has continued to grow to this day when it rests with us to do our share. We have to go on building if we would be worthy of him. As we pass away we ought to leave behind us, as the Apostles did, men more numerous than we to carry on this work.

The World's Highest Building

TRAVELERS returning from Europe to America, after a stay of several months' duration, were greatly surprised on passing the Narrows to see a marked change in the sky line of lower New York. About half-way between Brooklyn Bridge and the Battery, there towered a structure that looked like several New York "sky-scrapers" placed end on end. It was the new Singer Building, the highest structure in the world. It took much longer to complete the excavations and to prepare the foundations than it has to send skyward the superstructure of steel, concrete, stone, and brick. In fact, this spring the great framework was hardly up to the roofs of the surrounding buildings; now it is complete. The building is of forty-two stories, and from the street to the top of the cupola it is six hundred and sixteen feet. The topmost offices are over five hundred feet above the swarming crowds of humanity on Broadway. A fifty-six foot flagpole rises above the dome, and Old Glory will be kept flying at a height of six hundred and seventy-two feet. To those used to the old methods of construction, it appears startling to see masonry walls rising from the tenth story, while below the masons may have got the brick courses only up to the third. The upper sections are, of course, started from great steel girders. Our cover picture shows the workmen at their noon meal, nearly at the top of the building. Below may be seen the high buildings of New York's business district, and beyond are Brooklyn Bridge, the East River and Brooklyn.

A Bowery Mission Welcome

THE return, on September 22, of Mr. Hallimond, the Pastor Superintendent of the Bowery Mission, was signalized by a hearty welcome, which was arranged for him and Mrs. Hallimond by the mission workers. He found hundreds of his "boys," as he calls them, already seated in the hall when he entered. The words, "Welcome Home," in an evergreen setting, greeted Mr. Hallimond as he walked toward the platform.

It was a touching scene when the appeal was made for testimonies. Many men rose and spoke of the great change wrought by their visits to the Mission. Most of them had reached a point where they were "down and out," as they expressed it, and they seemed to overflow with joy when they realized the great change since they turned their back on the old life and entered into a new life with Christ as their guide.

To Dr. Klopsch, the friend and patron of the Mission, the speakers paid most affectionate tribute. As he could not be present to speak his welcome to the pastor a letter from him was read, and received the earnest and enthusiastic endorsement of the "boys." E. R. D.

Woman's most congenial and lucrative profession

BY our ideal method of training at home, we have enabled thousands of women to earn $10 to $25 per week. If you desire to become a nurse, or if you are a practical nurse and do not know of the remarkable work carried on by this school, you owe it to yourself to learn all we can tell you of the method by which we have opened a new sphere of opportunity to hosts of women through our training. A graduate writes:

"I have found the course very practical and helpful. I have acquired confidence in myself, for I have been taught how to nurse to the satisfaction of physicians and patients. I receive $3.00 a day and am busy all the time. All I am, as a nurse, the school has made me."

We know of no school that has so successful a plan by which the pupil's interest is stimulated and maintained. Our success is shown by the fact that we have graduated more nurses in the past twelve months than in the four years previous. We seek the enrollment of no student whom we cannot benefit.

From a hospital: "We desire to give our nurses advantage of the best training possible and have decided to have all of them take your course."

Wu Ting Fang

R. FRANK H. HITCHCOCK, Second Assistant Attorney-General, has been asked by President osevelt to become his private secretary. . William Loeb, the present secretary, l retire about the first of December to er private business. The office of secary to the President has been growing importance for the past twelve years. . Cortelyou, who is now holding his ond cabinet position, was first a nographer and then private secretary. many matters reiring tact and skill s through the secary's hands, that is considered preinary training for st important posts. may be that Mr. tchcock himself y look forward to binet rank within few years. Mr. rtelyou is menned as a vice-presential possibility.

Mr. Wu Ting Fang to return to Washgton as Chinese nbassador, comes e report from Pen. Mr. Wu has ent much time durg his official career Europe and Amer, and has probably better understandg of the "Western ewpoint" than almost any other Orienl who has been sent to this country. hile in Washington before he made sts of friends who were invaluable to m in several international complications. nerica may justly call herself China's st friend. It is still fresh in the public nd how Secretary Hay set himself mly against any division of Chinese tery, and also the way in which part of e Chinese indemnity was returned. In the ture China may again need a strong end in the court of nations, and the kin Government, probably realizing this, s sent Mr. Wu to resume his former endly relations in Washington.

Among the ladies of high rank and ealth who are taking an active interest those less fortunate than themselves, ne is more esteemed than the beautiful ountess of Warwick, who is now in this untry for the purpose of studying Amerin social problems. She has been in e public eye since she was a very young oman and has hosts of enthusiastic iends who believe in her sincerity, and so a few enemies—the latter people who elieve that a countess should do nothing it have a pleasant time as a leader of society, and who look with disfavor upon any one of the aristocracy leading anything but a butterfly existence. The Countess, however, believes that if the nobility intend to hold their place in the front rank of British affairs, they should really be leaders of present day social movements, and so is giving the best years of her life to the uplift of the poor and the bettering of the conditions of the lower classes.

Countess of Warwick and her Youngest Son

Some time ago she saw that more radical measures must be taken if her successes would be more than temporary ones. She began to be engaged actively in political campaigns, and is now called one of the finest woman speakers in the United Kingdom. She makes many of her political tours in an automobile, speaking from that where a hall does not serve her purpose. Her eloquence, added to her marvelous beauty, great tact and kindness of heart, have always created a favorable impression for the cause she advocates. It is no wonder that, to slightly change an expression once used of one of our own statesmen, by a large majority of the people she is "loved for the enemies she has made." She does not wish to spend her time, it is said, at social functions in this country, and so is traveling under the name of "Mrs. Greville," the family name of her husband, the fifth earl.

The Countess founded a college at Studley Castle for training the daughters of professional men in horticulture, dairy and poultry keeping. She also founded a technical school for boys and girls, and a home for crippled children, where those admitted may stay for any length of time. She is the president of a needlework guild, and started a store in London where the articles manufactured might be sold at prices that would bring some return to the workers. She is also a Poor-Law Guardian. At Warwick Castle and at Easton Lodge she has complete establishments for taking care of a number of poor people and nursing the sick. She has also found time to write on several topics, one of her most noteworthy books being Warwick Castle and Its Earls.

SHE QUIT

But It Was a Hard Pull

It is hard to believe that coffee will put a person in such a condition as it did a woman of Apple Creek, O. She tells her own story.

"I did not believe coffee caused my trouble, and frequently said I liked it so well I would not, and could not quit drinking it, but I was a miserable sufferer from heart trouble and nervous prostration for four years.

"I was scarcely able to be around, had no energy and did not care for anything. Was emaciated and had a constant pain around my heart until I thought I could not endure it. For months I never went to bed expecting to get up in the morning. I felt as though I was liable to die any time.

"Frequently I had nervous chills and the least excitement would drive sleep away, and any little noise would upset me terribly. I was gradually getting worse until finally one time it came over me and I asked myself what's the use of being sick all the time and buying medicine so that I could indulge myself in coffee?

"So I thought I would see if I could quit drinking coffee and got some Postum to help me quit. I made it strictly according to directions and I want to tell you, that change was the greatest step in my life. It was easy to quit coffee because I had the Postum which I now like better than the old coffee. One by one the old troubles left, until now I am in splendid health, nerves steady, heart all right and the pain all gone. Never have any more nervous chills, don't take any medicine, can do all my housework and have done a great deal beside.

with equal parts of dry stale bread crumbs; to each cupful of the mixture add one dessert spoonful of powdered charcoal. For three weeks, "little and often" should be the rule. Use feed five times a day, alternating as follows:

Pin-head oatmeal, cracked wheat, cracked corn—all passed through a fine sieve; stale bread, dried in oven and coarsely ground in hand mill, and just moistened with scalded milk; boiled liver and green sprouts of onions—half a cup of each, chopped fine and added to one whole cup of dry bread crumbs; all the dry mixed grain they will eat; fresh water three times a day.

I have never had any cases of gapes among my chicks, and I attribute it to the constant use of green onion tops or sprouts.

A trio of Pekin ducks will cost $7 and can be housed in any shed, or a large packing case can easily be converted into a comfortable house for them, if covered with roofing paper and the floor well bedded with clean straw twice a week. Ducks do not lay all the year round, like hens, but start about the middle of February, presenting you with an egg every day, so that two ducks will provide the required eleven for a sitting every week; then they can be set under a hen. From two ducks and a drake the first year I raised fifty eight, selling forty-six and keeping twelve for stock. When the fact is borne in mind that, at twelve weeks old, Pekins weigh five and six pounds apiece, and from May to December bring 18 or 20 cents a pound, it is evident that they are worth rearing. Don't think they must have running water to swim in. Pekins do as well, if not really better, without it; but they must have quantities to drink and the pans or dishes must be so constructed as to enable the birds to submerge the whole bill in the water, because there are two small holes at the base of the bill, which become clogged with food or mud, and unless they can rinse them out when drinking, the poor things smother.

For a flock of five laying ducks, take one quart of bran, a pint and a quarter of corn meal, half-pint of beef scraps, one quart of cut clover hay, and half-pint of grit. Scald the clover and steam the same as for hens. Add the other ingredients, give them the mixture just warm, and a little softer than you would for hens, night and morning; cut vegetables at noon, unless they are on free range among brush and grass; in which case, halve the night and morning rations and give nothing at noon after April 15.

Young ducks should get nothing for twenty-four hours. First week, mix half-pint of pinhead oatmeal, cracked wheat or stale bread crumbs, two hard-boiled eggs chopped fine, half-cup of coarse sand, just moisten with scalding milk. Feed five times a day as much as they will eat in ten minutes. Second and third weeks, half-pound of ground oats, the same of coarse sand, two tablespoonfuls of beef meal, or pint of finely-cut green clover, rye, or cabbage moistened with scalded milk. Feed four times a day. Those to be kept for stock should have the same rations until three weeks old, then they are given equal parts of ground feed and bran scalded with milk or water, and fed only twice a day, if on free range.

Guinea-fowls will roost up in the rafters of any outbuilding and almost feed themselves. They are always worth keeping as "watch-dogs," for they are constantly on guard, their shrill note of warning sounding at the approach of any strange presence, human or reptile, while their cry scares away hawks immediately. For the last five years there has been a steadily increasing demand for them as table birds during the closed season for game. Young birds properly cooked are delicious. My stock originated with a trio costing $3. From these we raised thirty-two, sold four pairs at six months old at $1 a pair, used eight for our own table and kept eight for stock. They always select brush or some wood-pile to lay in. Watch them from a distance for a few mornings between the hours of ten and twelve and locate the nest, but don't go near it while they are within sight. Remove the eggs with a long-handled spoon. If your hand comes in contact with the nest, they will know it and never use it again. Always leave three eggs in the nest. Their eggs being quite small, fifteen of them can be set under a hen, for, like ducks, guineas do not make good mothers.

Ten pairs of "homer" pigeons will start a flock for squab raising, at a cost of $15. Do not think that common pigeons at fifteen cents a pair will do as well as homers. Buy the stock from a reliable breeder who knows just what he is sending you.

A small house, eight by twelve, with slanting roof, such as is made for hens, only set on posts like a corn-crib, to keep out rats and mice, with a wire-covered yard as high as the house and as long as the cash to be expended on wire netting permits, will accommodate twenty-four pairs. The inside of the house should have the walls fitted with tiers of boxes a foot square. In each box place one of the earthenware dishes sold especially for pigeons' nests, two nests being necessary for each pair of birds.

As soon as the birds become accustomed to their new surroundings they will line the nest with bits of hay if a bundle is hung up in one corner of the house; the hen will lay two eggs with one day between. Both birds share the care of hatching, usually the male during the day and the hen at night, the process requiring eighteen days. For the first week the young are fed by the parents on a soft, digestible food which the birds have the power to produce and administer. After the fifth day hard grain and grit is added, until, on the thirteenth day, they can be taken out of the nest, fat and ready for market, without you having given them any attention whatever.

If you are going to keep all the young at first to increase stock, have another house and remove the young as soon as they are able to feed themselves.

It has been impossible to give full instructions for care, feeding, etc., in a short article like this, but you can, I hope, gather sufficient information as to the establishment and gradual growth of a poultry plant to enable you to realize approximately the very profitable results to be derived from small beginnings.

EASY FOOD
eady For Instant Use Without Cooking.

Almost everyone likes a cereal food of me kind at breakfast and supper, but the dinary way of cooking cereals results in a sty mass that is hard to digest, and if not operly digested, the raw mass goes down to the intestinal tract where gas is generated d trouble follows.
Everyone knows that good food properly gested keeps the body well, while poor food, even food of good quality that is poorly epared and not digested, is sure to bring some kind of disease.
The easiest food to digest in this line is rape-Nuts, made from wheat and barley, d cooked thoroughly at the factory, some to 16 hours being consumed in the different ocesses of preparation. The food, therefore, ready for instant service and the starch has en changed to a form of Sugar, so that it is re-digested and ready for almost immediate sorption.
A Chicago young lady writes that she suffered for years from indigestion and dyspepsia om the use of food that was not suitable to er powers of digestion. She says:
"I began using Grape-Nuts, and I confess having had a prejudice at first, and was peatedly urged before I finally decided to the food, but I have not known what indigestion is since using it, and have never been onger or in better health. I have increased weight from 109 to 124 pounds."
People can be well, practically without cost, they will adopt scientific food and leave off e indigestible sort. "There's a Reason."
Grape-Nuts Food is crisp and delicious to e taste. It should be served exactly as it mes from the package, without cooking, except in cases where it is made up into puddings nd other deserts.—Book of delicious recipes, nd "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Power to Conquer

By Mrs. M. Baxter

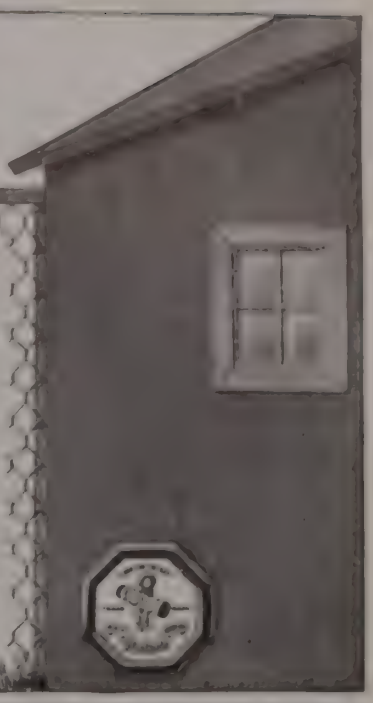
WHEN the children of Israel were established in Palestine, after Joshua and Eleazar divided it among the tribes, "the children of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb, the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him, Thou knowest the thing that the Lord said unto Moses, the man of God, concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea. Moses sware on that day, saying, Surely, the land whereon thy feet have trodden shall be thine inheritance and thy children's for ever, because thou hast wholly followed the Lord my God. Now, therefore, give me this mountain."

Caleb's title-deeds were the word of the living God, the proof of his promise fulfilled in his spared life and undiminished strength, and the confirmatory witness to the deed was his fellow witness for God, the faithful Joshua. "And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh Hebron for an inheritance." What a proof is Caleb's physical strength at eighty-five years of age to those words of God through Solomon: "My son, forget not my law, but let thine heart keep my commandments: for length of days, and long life, and peace, shall they add unto thee. . . . Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not to thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths. . . . It shall be health to thy navel and marrow to thy bones" (Prov. 3: 1-8).

The journey of the children of Israel was meant to be an object-lesson of what God could do for a people who fully trusted him. Their food supply and water supply was miraculous, the keeping of their clothing not less so. "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years" (Deut. 8: 4). "He brought them forth also with silver and gold; there was not one feeble [or sick one] among their tribes" (Ps. 105: 37). The only sickness which appeared among them was when God in judgment sent the plague and the fiery serpents in punishment for their sins. We may infer that had they all truly followed the Lord as Caleb and Joshua did, not one of them would have died until they reached Canaan. The service of God does not exhaust, the power of the Holy Spirit quickens the mortal body (Rom. 8: 11). It is the fleshly energy which leads to unnatural excitement, or the unbelief which leads to miserable depression, that wears out nerve and brain.

"Now therefore give me this mountain," said the strong old warrior; the mountain "whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how that the Anakim were there, and that the cities were great and fenced" (Josh. 14: 12). Give me the possession which will enable me to put my God to the test; give me no easy land to conquer; consider not my age; thou and I know the might of our God, and we seek glory to his name. The fear of these Anakim caused the failure of our companion spies; let us prove to all Israel that when God is with us, no foes are to be feared. "If so be the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out as the Lord hath said." Here is the point: "If the Lord be with me." "Certainly I will be with thee," God said to Moses; and he was enabled to bring a nation out of bondage to another nation, "by signs and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched-out arm, and by great terrors" (Deut. 4: 34). "I will be with thee," he said to Joshua, and the mighty fortress of Jericho fell before him. "With God all things are possible."

"And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh, Hebron for an inheritance." Hebron stood on high ground; it was mountain country. The meaning of Hebron is "fellowship." Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ (I. John 1: 3). How few of God's children have real and continuous fellowship with God! It is one thing to be reconciled to God, to be forgiven, to become a servant, a son.

For Poultry House Roofs and Sidings


We are just as proud of the fact that Rex Flintkote Roofing is so generally used by successful poultry raisers as we are that Rex covers the Atlanta Railroad Terminal and other mammoth structures—because the requirements of a satisfactory poultry house roofing and siding are very exacting.
REX FLINTKOTE ROOFING is preferred by poultry raisers because it not only keeps out water, but dampness as well, and maintains an even temperature in the house under all weather conditions. Nothing is more susceptible to these influences than delicate young chickens.

The Countess Singing Gospel Songs to the Men and Boys of the Bowery Mission

THE SPELL OF A BEAUTIFUL VOICE

Countess Von Boos-Farrar and her Gospel Work Among the Social Outcasts and the Children of Prisoners

WHEN a man or woman, with a heart filled with the love of Christ and overflowing with human sympathy, voluntarily steps down from an enviable position in the social world and devotes life and energies thereafter to the succoring and uplifting of the poor and lowly, such a e is warmly welcomed by those who are already engaged in such work. casionally the world hears of some earnest soul who, being touched with spirit of ministry, holds even wealth and title as of little worth, in com- rison with the joy that comes of Christian service rendered "in His name." Recently there has come into the field of philanthropic effort in New rk a new figure—the young and beautiful Swedish Countess Von Boos- rrar. Her work among the poor is wholly that of a volunteer, and is nfined to no sect or creed. Jews, Christians, and n those of no faith, share equally in her sympathies. w have sacrificed a more promising career to min- r to the needs of humanity than this gifted song- d of Sweden. She was born in Stockholm, her her, Count Von Boos, being of an ancient, noble . She inherited marked vocal talent. Her hus- d is a nephew of the late Archdeacon Farrar, of ndon, whose memory is immortalized in Westminster bey.

Countess Von Boos regards life with a cheerful opti- m. She is inclined to look always for the best in ple and conditions. Her philanthropies began in ldhood, long before she entered the Royal Academy, ere she received a thorough vocal training, and ere her magnificent mezzo-soprano voice brought her ny tempting offers for an operatic career. It is a ce of power and flexibility, clear and pure in tone. r dark brown hair is combed back from a high, ight forehead, framing a kindly yet strong face. So etly has she lived, so literally has she followed her n ideal of doing good without publicity, that in a nber of missions in this country where she has ed her voice, she has been known only as a stranger. For some time past the young Countess has been pe- iarly attracted to work among prisoners, and to the ritual and material needs of their often destitute ilies. In her visits to the homes of these unfortu- e ones she opens her heart to them by entering into ir real feelings with warm and generous sympathy, l by devising measures of practical betterment. She is not a "Tombs angel," : her influence is silently felt and acknowledged by many prisoners who have eived encouragement from her lips and relief from her hands.

The writer saw her lately at Jefferson Market Police Court, New York City, where she had waited patiently for several hours that the sentence of a girl for whom she would become responsible might be suspended.

"This poor girl," she said, "is charged with theft. She came from the country and went to work for small wages. Soon she found that she could not earn enough honestly to dress like other girls, and the poor child had no one to tell her that the thing to beautify her is modest behavior and upright living. However, I could accomplish nothing without the aid of the justices, who always give their encouragement and support. It is so easy to reach these people in distress, and no one can tell the ultimate results of a kind word said at the right time. It sometimes falls like a gleam of light on an utterly dark- ened life, and brings hope to the heart sunk in despair.

Countess Von Boos-Farrar

"My feeling for this kind of work has always been with me. Every Christmastide our family would migrate to the southern part of Sweden, to my father's country estate, and there I reveled in Christmas festivities with the poor children, and would sing for those who were invited to our home to get their presents and enjoy the feast. I have traveled in many lands since then, but I have never failed to visit the Salvation Army posts and offer to sing for the children and the unfortunate ones."

On leaving the prison after a visit to the inmates a few evenings ago, the Countess went to the Bowery Mission. Notwithstanding a heavy rain the hall of the Mission was crowded and a large overflow meeting waited outside. Those grim social outcasts, many of whom were weakened by sleepless nights or poorly nourished bodies, doubtless were in strong contrast to some of the audiences she had faced.

Once within the spell of her voice, the effect upon them was remarkable. Men old in years and misfortune, as well as the younger members of the great army of the unemployed and homeless, listened with tears to her singing. She prefaced her song with, "I am here to sing for you because God has taught me that I should love you—that your souls are as my soul, and we all belong to each other in common humanity and in a sublime faith in Jesus as our Saviour."

After the service she went amongst the audience, shaking hands and speaking words of encouragement.

The writer met her again at Spring Valley, N. Y., in the building provided for the Salvation Army's homeless children; also at the refuge for unfortunate women on Stuyvesant Square, at the Cremorne Mission and at the Doyer Street Mission. Wherever I found her, her benevolent smile and active sympathies communicated her own cheerfulness to every one around her.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.

Christianity's Four Dimensions

TEXT—EPH. 3: 18:

"May be strong to apprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth——"

ENTHUSIASM is the child of knowledge. The soil of ignorance may produce the fruits of apathy, of discontent, of cynicism and of unbelief; but all the best passions of the world have grown out of knowledge. The knowledge may be limited and it may sometimes be false knowledge, but no real enthusiasm, whether right or wrong, ever grew out of absolute ignorance.

Paul's enthusiasm for Christianity was based upon two great facts: his knowledge of Christ and his love of Christ. He was continually speaking about this knowledge. He said, "I know him whom I have believed." He said, "That I may know him and the power of his resurrection," and in the text he expresses a great desire that the disciples might be strong to apprehend and know the love of Christ.

I have three small stones here. I hold one of them up and say, "This stone, or sea-washed pebble, is marked by a band of quartz through the middle." You look at it and you are not much interested. Then I say, "This particular pebble came from the beach off Greystones, twelve miles south of Dublin, and on this beach, washed by the Irish Sea, are bushels of the same kind of stones." Your interest in this stone grows now because you know more about it. If I could tell you exactly why this band of quartz runs through the middle of the stone your interest would be doubled on account of your knowledge.

This second stone is very dull and uninteresting in its outward appearance. I hold it up, but you do not care much about it; but when I say that this is a piece of the Giant's Causeway, you are greatly interested. If I could tell you just why this groove in the stone occurs and how it was formed, your interest would increase.

This third piece of stone is as uninteresting as the second. You look at it and do not care much about it; but when I say that this came from within the cleft of the rock near Blagden of which Toplady wrote his famous hymn, "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me," then your interest is excited and you look at it with different eyes.

The Effect of Knowledge

Thus your interest in these three stones grows from your knowledge of each one, and the greater your knowledge the greater your interest. The same thing is true of any object in nature. The botanist who knows all about the little flower, if he is a true botanist, loves this flower and has an interest in it such as you or I cannot have. If this is true of inanimate things, how much more true must it be of so great a thing as Christianity! The more we really know of Christ and the Kingdom of God, the greater is our interest, the more enthusiastic our passion to be a part of it. And so Paul expresses his personal passion for the Kingdom of God by saying that he wants the disciples to be strong to apprehend the four dimensions of the kingdom—breadth, length, height and depth. Let us look at Christianity first of all as breadth.

This means, first, that Christianity includes in its programme all races of men. It is not an exclusive religion. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth," said Jesus, "will draw all men unto me." "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." In foreign countries one finds on the table at meal-time different articles of food. In Norway this summer we grew accustomed to five or six different kinds of cheese for breakfast, and as many different kinds of cold meat; but we never found a table anywhere in any country that did not have bread on it. We sat down at one table in a small inn in a country district of Norway where there were six different nationalities—English, French, German, Norwegian, Swedish and Italian—and all these people were eating bread; so is Christ the bread of life to all the nations.

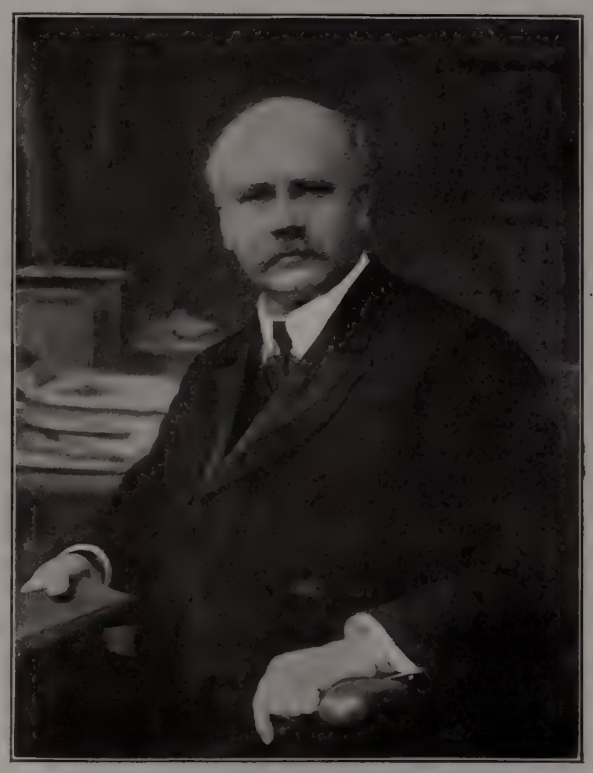
Second. The breadth of Christianity includes the reception of all truth. Christianity is not afraid of the laboratory. Whatever is true in science belongs to the Kingdom of God. Whatever is good or true in any other religion is swept into the programme of Christ. We do not need to be afraid of anything that science can discover. The breadth of the Kingdom of God is tolerant of all truth anywhere found. The one great challenge of God to the world has always been, "Prove me, put me to the test, try me." If Christianity will not stand the testing of one's need anywhere and under all conditions, it is not the final religion. "Come, let us reason together, saith the Lord." The breadth of Christianity is one of its glorious characteristics.

Third. By the breadth of Christianity we understand the great mercy of God in the forgiveness of sins. There was only one class of people Jesus was ungentle with—those who said they had no sin. For those who confessed their sin of different kinds Christ's mercy was overpowering. No one need fear in the presence of this breadth of compassion that he will not meet with favor from God because of a misspent or misdirected life. "There's a wideness in God's mercy like the wideness of the sea."

Let us look at Christianity as length.

This means, first, through all time. That is, we need not be afraid for Christianity historically. It is the "same yesterday, to-day, yea, forever." We need not be afraid that next century some other religion will be demanded by men in the place of Christianity. This thing with four dimensions insures its eternally stretching on. What is good for yesterday is good for to-morrow. We change our methods of church worship; we change our particular methods of evangelistic effort; we make the appeal to man's conscience from various standpoints; but the main things do not change. The eternal need of man in the forgiveness of sins; the comfort in the assurance of another life; the inspiration of daily living; these are the eternal things of the kingdom which will never cease to be.

Second. The length of Christianity insures us individually of Christian inspiration throughout our whole life. As Christianity will be eternally true as a historical fact, so it is true of the man from his birth to his death; the same Gospel, the same faith, will be with him in youth and in old age. This is a comforting and steadying fact. It is a pitiable sight to see a man grow old and lose the power and enthusiasm of his early Christian profession, to see him become sceptical or apathetic, or useless in service. The real Christian life is one which grows with a man's years, and his hope becomes sweeter and his Christian faith brighter as his physical body grows feebler. Indeed, one of the things which will keep one's mind clear and heart young is to maintain throughout the whole of one's life the youthful enthusiasm and faith which marked its beginning. This is always true when the length of Christianity is a part of one's experience.



Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.

Let us look at Christianity as height.

This means, first, that Christianity is equal to all of a man's mental and spiritual growth. We can never become so wise as to outgrow the wisdom of the Kingdom of God. In fact, Paul speaks of the love of Christ which "passeth knowledge." There are mysteries in the Christian theology large enough to tax the highest brain-power; so we may feel confident of the fact that Christianity can more than keep pace with mental achievement. The brightest and strongest intellects of the world in every century have acknowledged this fact, and have bowed in recognition of the greatness of God as it was seen in the person of our Lord.

Second. The height of Christianity continual draws men to the Divine. The object of Christ's li was to lead men up to God. That is the great end the road. Any religion or any teaching that does n finally lead men up to the Divine is a failure. Not ing will in the end satisfy the heart and intellect humanity except the superhuman. That which li above us must always be the satisfying part of th which lives on the earth. Man will never be satisfi with merely human companionship or human acquis tion. He will always "lift up his eyes to the hills fro whence cometh his help." This is the meaning of t height of which Paul speaks.

Lastly, let us look at Christianity as depth.

First. This means that Christianity can go as de as any one can go in ignorance. There is no man benighted that the love of Christ cannot reach dow for him; no man so deep in ignorance that he cannot lifted up out of it by the power of Christ.

Second. It means that Christianity can go as f down as a man can go in sin. He may be sunk in t lowest depth, but the power of Christ can go aft him. There is no depth so great that Christianity either unable or unwilling to reach down. This is t hope of sinful men. The love of God will go aft them. They cannot get beyond his reach.

Third. The depth of Christianity implies that t loving power of Christ will go after a man in his dee est sorrow. We are apt to think when some spec trouble comes to us that it is too great to be borne too great to be comforted. Many church membe and disciples of Christ give way to grief and sorrow the loss of friends and property, at the loss of hea or some pet plan, and resign themselves to days a years of mourning, practically saying that it is u less to be comforted. This is not the thought of t Christianity which has four dimensions. There is grief, no sorrow, no loss, no calamity, which drive down into the dark and depth, but that the love of G can penetrate down there and bring relief.

Every boy has fished from the bank and caught fi They are apt to be small. Unknown Depths

While in the House of Commons one day, one of t members said, "Let us go down and see the chapel the old crypt." Another member standing near said: "There is no chapel down there. That is the stable which Cromwell used to stable his horses in d ing the war with King Charles." But the first mem said, "Yes, I know all that; but the crypt has be changed." We went down, three of us, and found beautiful chapel—stained glass windows, costly marb columns and floor, the lives of the apostles in mosa The second member of Parliament in astonishment sa "I have been for many years a member of this Hou I was born in England and thought I knew somethi about this building, but this is all new to me. I had idea there was any such thing down here."

Many people go all through their lives witho knowing any of the beautiful things down in t depths. They never realize that everywhere the Kin dom of God goes deep into life to translate and tra form. Mrs. Scudder says in one of her hymns:

> Below all depths Thy saving mercy lies;
> Through thickest glooms I see thy light arise.

The vision of John was the vision of a four-squa city; it had twelve gates. The vision of the Kingdo of God is always that of greatness. Paul caught glimpse of the power of Christ which has been in tated, but perhaps not surpassed. Only as we li with all the centuries between him and us, our surv of what is now done by Christianity ought to be on correspondingly larger scale.

As many of us begin our work of the year in t churches after a period of rest, let us have this thoug of the greatness of the Kingdom of God. It is small thing to have taken the vows of Christian d cipleship. We belong to an organization greater th armies or navies; superior to the sky-scraping cities men; to the wealth which is in banks or railroads vessels of commerce. We belong to something whi has four dimensions—breadth, length, depth, heig Let us then do the work which is God-given.

> Give us a vision of this Son of God:
> Four-square may all the Holy City lie,
> Benignant, beautiful and broad,
> And may this vision of the kingdom never die.

A GOSPEL SERVICE IN MADISON SQUARE, CONDUCTED BY WORKERS OF THE NATIONAL BIBLE INSTITUTE

WITH THE OPEN AIR SOUL-WINNERS

FOR those who wish to be useful in leading men to Christ in the heart of New York City, there are many opportunities. One of these is the noonday open air meeting, under the auspices of the National Bible Institute, which has been held all summer at Madison Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street every day, excepting Saturdays and Sundays. At these meetings an average of three hundred men have gathered to listen to the Gospel proclaimed by laymen.

Eager and respectful attention has been given to the message, and large numbers remain at the close of the service to speak with the workers. In fact, the few faithful men who have undertaken this work have been astonished at the number of those who have waited to talk about the Christian life. Perhaps sixty per cent. of such audiences are foreign born and totally unused to such presentations of the Gospel of Christ.

A young lad, perhaps seventeen years of age, raised his hand at one meeting. In answer to an inquiry, he said he wanted to live a Christian life, but did not understand very much about it. He was a Swedish boy, quite ignorant of the Bible. He worked in a department store in the neighborhood.

A tall man, whose face was daubed with black, said he was an iron-worker. A good many of the workers attended and enjoyed the meetings, he said. Of the message, he said to the preacher: "What you say is true; but we are a very rough set." He was told that Christ could come in and soften the hearts of such men as himself, as well as bring peace and happiness.

A well-dressed young man said he was a disciple of Ingersoll. He was told that evidently he had more confidence in the teaching of Ingersoll than his own daughter, for it was learned that she is a Sunday School teacher in a Christian church. This man, after a few moments, admitted that Ingersollism was "a mixture of vanity and self-righteousness and a jumble of catchy sayings," and he finally confessed that the Christ was true. The workers urged him to accept the Gospel personally.

A fine-appearing young business man next stood up. He said he was not a Christian. What puzzled him was how the speakers and workers got such good clothes. We told him that a Christian had no need to spend money for drink or tobacco, consequently he had it for other things. He turned out to be a young Hebrew business man, whose sole idea of success was money. He said he believed Christ was the Messiah, but that life was for business purposes.

A decent looking fellow of apparent intelligence acknowledged with tears that "he must do something," as drink had lost him a good position, and also his church membership; and that, because of his degradation, he was unable to get work. He wept as he said, "I am being supported by my wife, who goes out scrubbing at one dollar a day." We told him that, much as he needed work, he needed Christ more, because except through a new life he could not succeed. He did not yield, but went away repeating that "he must do something, as the devil had so tight a grip on him."

The workers talked with an unusually bright young man, who wore a Greek letter society pin. He said he was a college student, but had no use for Christianity; "he only believed in facts." I told him I was a fact for Christianity, and how my life had been changed through it. I told him the great Young Men's Christian Association building, on Twenty-third Street and Seventh Avenue, was a fact for Christianity and would never have been built had not Christ lived. Then he inquired who Christ's father was, and we saw he simply wanted to quibble. We urged earnestly and lovingly one fact upon him in conclusion, and that was that we must all stand before the judgment seat of Christ, to give an account of our beliefs, as well as our deeds. With that we left him. A few days later this young man stood in the front row and received the message with most earnest attention.

These cases will indicate the character of some of those who stay for conversation. Any one who is willing to do hand-to-hand work in trying to lead men into the light as it is in Christ, is always welcomed at these meetings. The National Bible Institute, of 156 Fifth Avenue, would like to conduct twenty five noon Gospel meetings if funds were available. It is not an expensive work. Volunteer leaders and speakers can usually be secured for the meeting, and the incidental expenses of the meetings for one week for music, which ought to include cornet, organist and precentor, may average $20. Doubtless many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be deeply interested in the work now being done at this centre of strong evangelistic influence. Their sympathetic co-operation would be warmly welcomed.

GEORGE ALDEN SANFORD.

GENERAL BOOTH'S TRIUMPHAL TOUR

RECEIVED by cheering crowds, and welcomed by governors, mayors and other officials high in affairs of state, the progress of General Booth, of the Salvation Army, has been a triumphal tour, though he comes not as a hero who has conquered countries and cities, but as one who, in the face of great difficulties, has conquered the hearts of his fellowmen.

General Booth looked forward to making this American tour when he was in his country last year for a few weeks on his way to Japan. His departure from Liverpool was made the occasion for a great demonstration, the members of the Salvation Army making but a small portion of the great crowd of people of all creeds that assembled at the dock to bid the general a Godspeed on his journey.

It was the original intention to land on the soil of the United States to start the American campaign; but it was found impossible to secure accommodations on any of the steamers running to New York or Boston, so the general sailed on a Canadian line that took him up the most beautiful part of the St. Lawrence River, and landed him beneath the frowning walls of the ancient city of Quebec. The party soon took a train for Portland, Maine, and from there one for Boston.

At Portsmouth, New Hampshire, "The City of Peace," as it has been called ever since the signing of the Russian-Japanese treaty, General Booth was met by his daughter, Commander Booth.

Boston's reception had none of the coldness with which the Athens of America is credited in the public prints. The city, through its mayor, and the State, through its governor, joined in the welcome. The finest hotel in the Back Bay placed the royal suite at General Booth's disposal. The rooms are the same that were occupied by Prince Henry of Prussia, brother of the German Emperor, and by Prince Wilhelm of Sweden.

When the general's train drew in it was switched to a siding to avoid the crush of waiting people. Mayor Fitzgerald, of Boston, arm in arm with a Salvation Army colonel, walked along the tracks to the general's car and bade him welcome. The general and mayor then walked between lines of cheering thousands to the temporary platform where the opening exercises of the tour were to take place.

Mayor Fitzgerald spoke of the general as the living personification of an idea, of the sublime courage that knows no defeat; of the perfect charity that can see none lost and none suffer; one who had an abiding faith in human nature. He said General Booth discovered the little grain of gold that rests in the moral dross of every man, however debased or fallen. After speaking of the new People's Palace, a magnificent structure erected in Boston for the use of the Salvation Army, the mayor ended his address by aptly comparing General Booth to the village parson of Goldsmith's poem:

His looks adorned the venerable place:
Truth from his lips prevailed with double sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray.

The last two lines, in particular, struck home to the auditors, as they remembered the hard fight the army has had for recognition, and what a great amount of good it has accomplished, though attacked by the very people who should have been its helpers.

The following Sunday the general delivered a lecture. The governor of the State presided, and the platform was solidly banked with rows of men and women prominent in the political, social, literary and philanthropic circles of the city. Before the general concluded his address, he gave, as is always his custom when he addresses a meeting, a "personal invitation to the Cross." Before the eyes of hundreds of people the Boston theatre, in which the meeting was held, seats over three thousand fifty-five came forward.

General Booth, after leaving Boston, started to hold meetings in the following cities: Schenectady, Utica, Rochester, in New York State; Chicago, Ill.; St. Louis, Mo.; DesMoines, Iowa; Minneapolis, Minn.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Cincinnati and Columbus, Ohio; Pittsburg, Pa., and Washington, D. C. Here he will be received by President Roosevelt at the White House, a special appointment having been made before General Booth left England. From Washington he will go to Baltimore to hold a meeting on October 30. Then he goes to Philadelphia. He will make his start in New York City, remaining there until November 9, when he sails for home.

THEIR PARISH A HUNDRED ISLANDS

Gospel Workers in the Philippines, their Hardships and Perils—An Opportunity for "Christian Herald" Readers

TO those who are criticizing the American policy in the Philippines, and who do not know what is really going on there, a visit to the archipelago at this time would be a pleasing revelation. On October 16, the first great step toward establishing representative government in the islands was taken, when the newly elected Filipino Assembly met in Manila. Secretary of War Taft expected to be present on this auspicious occasion.

It was declared by President McKinley after the conquest of these islands, that Providence had placed them in our hands, to civilize, to educate and to train in the way of self-government; and our nation is faithfully fulfilling the trust. Not only are the islanders being taught the principles of self-government by the election of their own municipal and provincial officers and by electing a Congress, but they have a public school system under which 500,000 children are now enrolled—more than double the number in attendance before the war.

We can hope for great things of the Filipinos in the near future. Thousands of them to-day are speaking their emancipator's language. But it should not be forgotten that the Filipinos came beneath the American flag after more than three hundred years of servitude to the Spanish race. Liberty of conscience and freedom of thought had been strenuously forbidden them by their religious rulers. Cock-fights, image processions and church feasts with their candles and fireworks were almost the only solace offered these people in place of the Bible, with its uplifting teachings of the Saviour of men.

Secret societies, in which thousands upon thousands of the Filipinos banded themselves together for the liberation of their people, were the one outlet for the hopes and vital aspirations of this people during the whole period of Spanish authority. With all the unrest of those past generations in his veins, the Filipino finds himself to-day under American law and protection, and he looks forward with still more ardent hope to the future of his own people.

But the Gospel, above and beyond all other influences, is proving the strongest power for the uplift of the Filipinos. The ex-governor of the island of Negros, a warm friend of the Bible and education, said recently: "The only hope for my people is the Gospel." Senor Lorena had seen what consciences and minds enlightened through God's Word could bring about for his people. He had seen and knew that thousands of the Filipinos had been changed and uplifted from degrading immorality, and childish ignorance of man's duty and responsibility, into pure-principled men and women, who take up the burden of their homes and families and of their people through the Gospel, as a God-given duty.

"Mother Cesaria" is an old lady of more than sixty years. Her experience, and that of her only son, Ricardo Alonso, are illustrative of what is taking place very widely in the southern Philippines to-day. So highly do they appreciate the Gospel for their people that, without a moment's hesitation, the son refused a bribe of $2,500 which was offered to him if he would give up the preaching of the Gospel. Moreover, the young man was in great poverty at the time, and his venerable mother, through having become a Protestant, was dependent on him for support, while his wife and two little children had also to be cared for. A short time afterward, one of the children died owing to the unhealthy surroundings in which, through poverty, the parents were obliged to live.

Although old Mother Cesaria knew that her son's life had been threatened, even in the city of Cebu where they lived, she consented that he should take the Gospel into the robber-infested mountains of the island. Cesaria herself became a Bible woman. With a little party of other women she took a five days' journey on foot over the mountains which traverse the island of Cebu from north to south. This arduous journey was taken that these women might give the Saviour's message to the towns on the distant coast. In the first village, Cesaria and her fellow Bible women erected a church of bamboo, with no other aid than that of a blind man, whose stronger hands were guided by the women, who were too weak to drive in the heavy supports for the building.

The first Protestant church built in Cebu City was erected through the efforts of native converts. It represents magnificent sacrifices. Mother Cesaria herself gave up a month's wages which she had earned through washing. When the missionaries tried to dissuade her from leaving herself so totally unprovided for, she insisted with tears, and sobbed out, "The thought of our being able to build a house to our dear Lord makes me full up clear to the throat. So, you see, I could not swallow much anyway." Many others made like sacrifices for the building of their church.

Within the short space of five years—since the work was begun in Cebu—some 1,500 persons have been received into the church upon profession of faith. Backsliding among them is exceedingly rare. These converts are scattered over the whole of Cebu and a few neighboring islands. There are between fifty and one hundred islands under our circuit waiting and begging for the Gospel. In all, we are responsible for one million one hundred and fifty thousand souls. Their pleas for the Gospel are pathetic in the extreme, and here, as elsewhere, the laborers are but few.

The towns of these islands are all situated on the coast, and the people from the interior coming to the coast to sell their produce and buy their necessities can most easily be reached from these towns by the missionaries. But the facilities for getting from place to place, and from island to island, have greatly hindered the Gospel work. Missionaries and workers have had recourse only to the small native boat (canoe with outrigger), and have lost much precious time waiting for wind and weather. It is so common to have sudden gales arise also, and many times it has seemed that only by the providence of God the missionaries' lives have been saved. Journeys that should have taken only a few hours have often consumed several days, bringing with them great hardships as well as danger to the workers, who were exposed to rains, the hot sun and constantly threatening waves. Add to these the ordinary condition of the climate, and even the strongest constitution can stand such strain and peril for but a limited number of years. But the worst feature of the case is that thousands upon thousands of the heathen are made to wait indefinitely for the light of the Gospel.

In view of all these facts, we have decided to appeal for help to the kind-hearted people of God, who have been identified with the many good works of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers in heathen lands. We ask you to help us to reach these outlying and surrounding islands—a hundred of them, all populous and now ripe for the Gospel. Instead of the frail, slow-moving and dangerous native canoes, so liable to founder in a breeze, we would wish to have a standard Gospel mission boat to ply in and out among these islands and to carry the message of love and salvation to the waiting thousands who will help us. Every dollar and every dime which you may send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the Filipino Mission Boat, will be received by this journal and duly acknowledged.

With such a boat our band of missionaries would be able to treble and quadruple the present work, and at the same time keep their health and do longer and better service in that trying climate. All the Protestant denominations now at work in the Philippines consider this particular field a wonderfully promising one. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from time to time, will bring tidings of new islands reached and new thousands brought into the light and liberty of the Gospel of Christ, its readers will be thankful and glad that they have had part in it.

ELIZABETH WHITE JANSEN,
(REV.) FREDERICK JANSEN,
Missionaries to the Cebu-Visayan Filipinos

[We heartily commend the appeal of these missionaries for a mission boat to enable them to carry on their Gospel work in Cebu and the surrounding islands. Any contributions for that purpose may be sent to "Mission Boat," CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Every contribution, however small, will be acknowledged in these columns.]

Translators' Errors Set Right

MANY readers who bought the Standard Bible have written to us expressing their great satisfaction with the volume. It corrects nearly 3,000 mistranslations of the King James and Revised Versions and sheds light on a multitude of passages hitherto misinterpeted. It is rapidly finding its way into colleges, churches, Sunday Schools and thousands of American homes. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has secured a number of copies of the Standard Bible, with Illustrated Bible Dictionary, Concordance and Maps, altogether 1,622 pages, large type, beautiful print, extra thin paper, superbly bound in American Levant. Sent, all charges prepaid, on receipt of only two dollars. Address CHRISTIAN HERALD Book Department, Bible House, New York City.

Ever Popular Christmas Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a Christmas gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through periodically reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A BEAUTIFULLY illustrated monthly magazine for young children. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and above all true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also play-work for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

THE Magazine in a vast country like the United States—where the dimensions are those of a continent—has an influence almost unlimited. It reaches as many thinking people on the west coast as on the east, in the South as in the North. The Paris press controls France; the London press controls England; but only the magazine is big enough to reach all America—such a field is beyond the scope of the greatest daily ever published.

McClure's Magazine was the first periodical to realize this great responsibility, and the first to make the monthly periodical a vital influence in good government and good citizenship—an instrument to help a great, wide-spread people understand itself and its possibilities.

Pearson's Magazine

DESTRUCTIVE journalism has had its day. Far-minded conservatism is now having its inning. For almost two years Pearson's has been consistently constructive in its editorial policies. Now there have come to be muckrakers; but Pearson's remains—the leader.

In fiction, too, Pearson's has its distinctive quality. It is famous everywhere as the creator of Captain Kettle—Maurice A. W., Dick O., Rudolph Mason and Captain Roseveare.

A novelty feature for the coming year is a light sociological study in verse entitled "The Seven Stages of Unrest," by Carolyn Wells, copiously illustrated by Wallace Morgan—the creator of the famous "Flatty Rudley."

Review of Reviews

IN the coming Presidential election year, with its tense interest in the trusts, the tariff, the railroads, politics generally and political personages, the Review of Reviews will be doubly valuable to you. With Dr. Albert Shaw as editor, "Progress of the World"—with the cartoon history of the month—with the timely contributed articles on just the questions you are interested in—with the gist of the really important articles in the other magazines of the world sorted out for you, and the reviews of new books you can keep intelligently up with the times at a minimum cost of time, effort and money.

In the Review of Reviews you not only get the best informed, most timely and useful magazine in the world, but you also get more and better and the other periodicals of half the price you need.

Success Magazine

THE investigation by Success Magazine of the opium curse in both China and India, and of the responsibility of Great Britain and British traders for its extension against the protest of the Chinese Government, who foresaw the inevitable demoralization of all classes of their people forms the strongest, most important and most far-reaching work done by any American magazine for many years. Success has spent nearly $10,000 in making this investigation, sending Samuel Merwin on its special representative for a six months' residence in the Orient for this purpose, and the first of this series of articles appears in Success for October, 1907. Also the beginning of "Lentala"—a love serial story of adventure—and the first of several articles on "The Real Thomas W. Lawson."

Woman's Home Companion

THE Woman's Home Companion gives to its readers each month as much good reading and as the story magazines as much first-class and quick as the picture magazines, more authoritative articles of interest to women than any other publication, and in addition a complete assortment of helpful departments serving every practical need of the American woman.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale retains his position at the head of the Companion's editorial staff. Mrs. Sangster, Jack London, Madame Nazimova, Paul Lewis, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Mary Stewart, Paul Laurence Dunbar, Mary Hartwell Catherwood, the author of Lilac Bonnets, and a number of other distinguished contributors to the Companion.

World To-Day (The)

THE only magazine of its kind published, the World To-Day is a unique publication. It is not a mere review, but is the result of original editorial work and research, and its editorial and illustrative contributors are the foremost men and women of the day. The reader will find in it a compilation of the idle hour, and best of all, a comprehensive view of the whole world. Many illustrations not to be found in other magazines of the class will also be found in World To-Day. It has 48 to 80 pages each issue, and has been issued for [illegible] years. It is the recognized champion and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

A Freethinker's Conclusions

ONE of the saddest testaments that has been left to the world for many a day is the memorandum that the late Mr. D. H. Chamberlain, once Governor of South Carolina, left among his papers, which is now published in the North American Review. Mr. Chamberlain was from boyhood an earnest student of religion. He was brought up by a godly father and mother in a modified Calvinistic system, attended in his youth church and Sunday School, and when he attained maturity sought out the most eminent preachers, and read every book on religious subjects he could find in English or German. He was thoroughly saturated with religious literature, but at the end of his life he writes this memorandum in which he avows himself a materialist. It is a sad ending to such laborious study and reminds us of the career of Ecclesiastes, who had nothing better to say, after a still wider course of inquiry, than "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

Mr. Chamberlain's "fundamental concepts" with which he began his inquiry were three, the first of which accounts for the dreary conclusion he reached. He says he held that "reason, human reason, one's own reason, is the final arbiter or touchstone of truth." Holding that concept, we cannot be surprised that he reached the goal of materialism. He expresses his conclusion in the words, "Death ends all." Perhaps human reason, unaided, could not have guided him to any other conclusion. Reason can tell us nothing positively of a future life. It necessarily confines itself to this life, and does not admit any existence it cannot prove. Reason must halt at the grave, for there its work is finished. It is there that faith becomes our guide, and having accompanied us, cheering, encouraging, and supporting us through life, goes onward when reason deserts us. We can imagine that if a caterpillar were endowed with reason, it might talk in a similar strain when it entered the cocoon from which it will emerge a butterfly. The faith that God gives us is a far safer guide than reason, which is necessarily inadequate when it attempts to decide spiritual things.

The Apostle Paul had a clear idea of the futility of such a method of study, and he warns us that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Christ put the same truth in other words when he said that God had hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and had revealed them to babes. When man puts on an arrogant attitude and brings to the touchstone of his reason the revelation God has made to the world, presuming to judge the infinite by his little finite rule, he places himself outside the spiritual realm. He is like a child in school who refuses to believe the truths stated to him, simply because he cannot understand them. We expect him to receive some things on faith, and his education cannot proceed until he does accept them. Mr. Chamberlain appears to have taken a course utterly suicidal to spiritual development, and we deplore, though we cannot wonder at, its leading him into the desert of materialism.

The Presidential Holiday

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S hardest taskmaster is himself. From early in the morning until late in the day, he is hard at work on the thousand and one problems that come to the attention of the nation's chief executive. Such a strain could be endured by the machinery of no human being unless some change and recreation was at times interspersed. Energetic in his play as in his work, the President, following the example of many other famous people since the days of Nimrod, has gone on a hunting expedition.

The President is equally at home in the canebrakes of the South and in the mountains of the North, and the Southern people seem to appreciate the fact. This is natural, as he belongs by descent to both sections of the country, his father being a Northerner, and his mother from the South.

Several well-known guides, who have a thorough knowledge of the strategy of Bruin and the wiles of the panther, are on hand to see that the President will make the animals' acquaintance in their native haunts. At this writing it was not ascertained that the members of the presidential party had supplied themselves with any great quantity of bear meat, nor that they had been compelled to dodge to escape any heavy fall of ducks, though all report a gratifying addition to their store of faith, and that we suppose is really the main object of the chase with most people. One dispatch to the press, however, reports that a sound like heavy cannonading has been heard within a few miles of the presidential headquarters. This indeed may have been only a ruse to scare away the politicians, who are trying to find out whether the President will again be a candidate in 1908.

The people of the country, turning as they are more and more to the natural life in the open air, sympathize heartily with the President's desire once in a while to escape from the strain and formality of official life. His summer stay at Oyster Bay, while spent in more healthful surroundings than in Washington, was never free from work and anxiety, the President taking his work and his staff with him.

The Battle at the Front

THIS age promises to eclipse all its predecessors in Christian activities. It is displaying phenomenal energy and zeal in carrying the Gospel to distant lands, and in spreading it everywhere at home. Men and women are rapidly learning the great secret that consecration, to be thorough, must include the individual and all that the Father has given to his keeping. We are stewards and must give account of our stewardship.

It is a healthy spiritual indication that people have begun to understand that no one can ever be impoverished by giving to the Lord's work. All human experience demonstrates the truth of this statement. God blesses with ever-increasing abundance the "cheerful giver."

John Wesley, in the first year of his ministry, received $150, lived on $140, and gave $10. Next year, receiving $300, he lived on the same amount and gave $160. In fifty years of service his gifts aggregated $150,000, and he has testified that his income always more than kept pace with the increase. Carey, on a salary of $500, gave half to the Lord's work. He, with Marshman and Ward and their families, lived at a joint cost of $500 a year. These three, during their whole missionary careers, contributed nearly $500,000 toward India's evangelization. If we add to this their mighty spiritual influence and their splendid personal labors in the field, we see how magnificently the material consecration supplemented the spiritual and intellectual. Livingstone, early in his career, made a vow that he would give to the cause of Gospel missions "all he might earn beyond his bare subsistence." He did so faithfully and his complete consecration was the means of lighting up a large part of the Dark Continent. Livingstone was one of the most outspoken proclaimers of the stewardship of wealth. He wrote that the "time would come when rich men would think it an honor to support whole stations of missionaries instead of spending their money on hounds and horses." Some rich men are doing this to-day. We know of several who are supporting, quietly and unostentatiously, missionaries in various parts of the foreign field. May their number be multiplied.

But this is not an exclusive privilege of wealth. People of moderate means and even the poor may have a share in the work—a quiet corner in the Lord's vineyard, where they can labor through a representative. And their efforts, however humble, will be blessed, not in proportion to their size, but in proportion to the extent of the sacrifice; for a poor man's or woman's gift of a few dollars may be even more precious in God's sight than the millions of the rich. Jesus himself said that the poor widow had cast into the Lord's treasury more than all the rest.

Among those who have sent in their names to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for individual missionary support on the "native substitute plan," are men and women in all stations of life, poor and well-to-do, the former class, however, predominating. They represent all the Protestant denominations. That they make sacrifices, in most cases, to support a missionary substitute adds to the spiritual value of the work as it will assuredly add to the blessing to result from it. The Lord's work is self-multiplying; the harvest always comes in unexpected places, and often in unforeseen abundance.

We look forward to the time when every Christian at home, either individually or jointly with others, will have a representative in the foreign mission field, as the supporter of some godly man or woman trained to do battle with the forces of heathenism, and carrying forward the banner of the Cross. In this age of great spiritual activities, each of us owes this as a duty to Christianity and the Gospel which we profess to believe and serve. Let us see to it that we perform that duty faithfully and cheerfully.

How Japan Feels Toward Us

SENSATIONAL correspondents have endeavored of late to show that there was a condition of serious friction in our relations with Japan, and that China, too, was still influenced by the same feelings which gave rise to the boycott against this country several years ago. Recent events have given these foolish stories their quietus. In his Oriental tour Secretary Taft has received such marked assurances of friendship from both China and Japan as to leave not a trace of doubt of the sincere friendship of both nations for this country.

He found a marked change in China. The boycott was forgotten in the warm greetings to America's distinguished representative. Fetes, luncheons and receptions followed in rapid succession, and the highest officials vied with each other in impressive attentions. Speaking unofficially, he expressed the general conviction among Americans when he said that "China had no territory which America coveted, no prosperity which America grudges, no powers, justly exercised, which America resents." He assured them that China's industrial or political development could arouse no jealousy or apprehension here while it was conducted along the lines of peaceful prosperity and the maintenance of law and order.

While the cables were bringing the news of Mr. Taft's royal welcome in China, they also brought gratifying assurances, though of a somewhat different character, from Japan. One hundred American missionaries, representing all denominations, have united in a memorial in which, while disclaiming any desire to mingle in politics, they express a desire to remove misunderstanding and "to testify to the sense of international justice, the faith and the friendship of the United States, and the belief that the reports of the belligerent attitude of the Japanese do not represent the true feeling of the nation." They record their appreciation of the universal courtesy and helpfulness of the Japanese government and people at all times, and deprecate any attempts to create a different impression.

These facts ought to be a sufficient answer to the sensation-mongers who have been so industriously predicting trouble in the East. But the "imaginative correspondent" is a hard creature to discourage.

Among the Workers

—REV. J. H. REED, D.D., has succeeded Rev. A. P. CAMPHOR as President of the College of West Africa at Monrovia, Liberia.

—EVANGELIST E. T. LIDDELL lately closed a nine days' campaign with the Baptist and Methodist churches of Girdletree, Md., in which fifty men and women professed conversion.

—ARCHBISHOP NUTTALL, of Jamaica, Episcopal Primate of the West Indies, now visiting this country, in a recent address at Clifton Springs, N. Y., made a strong plea for aid in behalf of the Episcopal community of Kingston, where the principal church buildings were destroyed by the recent earthquake. As yet there are no funds for rebuilding the churches. Sixty-four churches and other buildings in his diocese were leveled or injured by the shocks.

Egypt's Regal Mausoleums

AMONG the scenes visited by tourists in Egypt, none is more sought than the rock-hewn chambers in which the mummies of the ancient kings were found. It is a vivid contrast that is shown in ıe illustration on this page of the modern rest-house ·ected for the convenience of visitors, with the under-·ound splendors of these ancient mausoleums. The tter were chiseled out of the solid granite of the moun-in side, in the natural amphitheatre at the end of a arrow gorge about four miles from the Nile. They are ıtered by a low archway, which stands at the head of a ng staircase descending about one hundred feet into ıe earth, and then extending like the tunnel of a mine ıout three hundred feet to the outer chambers, in which ıe presents and offerings were placed. Beyond these ·e the actual burial chambers in which was found the ıdy of Rameses II., the oppressor of the Israelites, om whose wrath Moses fled into Midian. With him ere the bodies of his father Seti and his grandfather ameses I. and his grandson Rameses III. There they ıve been lying since they were hidden about thirty cen-·uries ago, until the explorers found them and removed ıem to the museum at airo. That amphitheatre ust have once been a busy ace, for the work of cut-ng those tombs must have ccupied thousands of men r many years.

One of the most import-nt discoveries in the tombs f the kings since that of ıe mummy of Rameses is ıat of the body of Queen hiy, the brilliant lady ho, though not of royal ood, nor of a particularly ble family, won the love f the Pharaoh Amenhotep II., whose devotion to her rms one of the most eautiful romances of gyptian history. Her eauty was memorialized exquisite statuary all er Egypt, and her virtues corded on the rocks. Her usband adored her, and elighted in nothing so uch as erecting gorgeous alaces for her home. There ıe held brilliant court, here she gathered the lent and chivalry of the me. There the beautiful oung Queen moved in enes of Oriental splendor, ıd increased her power er the whole kingdom. ater in life she attempted religious revolution, and under her influence her hus-and began to displace the Egyptian god Amen in favor the new god Aton. After his death Thiy exercised a ill stronger influence over her son Amenhotep IV., and ıtil her death exerted imperial power over him and his ingdom. The mummy of the beautiful Queen, whose atures show how the loveliness that was celebrated the statues made of her in her youth, faded in her ter years, has now gone to join those of the earlier haraohs in the museum. The mortuary chambers in hich she hoped to lie forever have been despoiled and odern men and women gaze upon her faded and riveled form as it lies side by side with other monarchs hose glory has passed away.

Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue forever id their dwelling places to all generations. Nevertheless, man ing in honor abideth not; he is like the beasts that perish. s. 49: 11, 12.)

irthmarks Removed

The Academy of Medicine in the French capital has ade the announcement that a means has been found of moving birthmarks which have hitherto been considered delible. Two of the foremost physicians of Paris, Dr. Vickham and Dr. Degrais, have been experimenting ith radium, and in the course of their study noticed the fect it had on the human skin. Pursuing their investi-ations, they found that not even birthmarks resisted its fluence. They have now notified the Academy of Med-ine that they have perfected a method of its application. y applying to the affected cuticle a plain surface, cov-ered with varnish, in which a minute quantity of radium has been mixed, the birthmark gradually disappears. The Academy has now in its possession sets of drawings which show the stages of removal after each application. It is stated that a very short course of treatment suffices when the patient is an infant. Dr. Bulkley of the Skin and Cancer Hospital in New York, says: "I have not tried the method, but I know Dr. Wickham, and I know him to be a very careful man, and I will look into the idea he suggests." Experiments are to be made here forthwith. If they are successful, as seems probable, there will be numerous applicants for treatment, for there are many who are anxious to have these disfigurements removed. Would that those whose characters are dis-figured by sinful habits, the moral lepers whose iniquity is a disgrace to them and a danger to society, were simi-larly anxious to be delivered.

Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. (Isa. 1: 18.)

A Wife Defrauded

A singular application was made a few days ago to a court in Brooklyn, N. Y. It was made by a widow, who asked to have the record of her husband's death amended. It read that he was single, whereas he was married and she was his widow. It appears that the two had quarreled and had separated. The wife went away to her friends and the husband, greatly depressed, broke up housekeeping, sold the furniture and removed from New York to Brooklyn. Nearly a year afterwards, the wife, needing funds, went to her husband's place of busi-ness to ask him for money. She was surprised to find it closed and still more astonished to learn from his neigh-bors that he was dead. Further inquiries led to the dis-covery that one of his relatives had attended to the funeral and had sold his business and all his effects and had disappeared. He had entered on the death notice the statement that the deceased was single, and as there was no one to disprove his statement it was admitted. The widow asserts that her husband's estate was worth fully $10,000, and claims that if he had not died sud-denly he would have made a will leaving her at least a large share. She asked to have the record changed, so that in the event of her getting trace of the relative, she might have no difficulty in prosecuting her claim. There is nothing to show whether the fault of the quarrel and separation lay with the husband or the wife. Certain it is, however, that the loss she now deplores might not have fallen on her if she had not left him and, for so long a time, kept herself apart from him. Her hus-band might have insured his property coming to her if he had not drawn the inference from her continued absence, which he was very liable to draw, that she had ceased to have any affection for him. There is reason to fear that disappointment such as here awaits many who hope for an inheritance in heaven when they die, who yet show no love for their Lord, or ever come near to him in his house.

Know therefore and see that it is an evil thing and bitter that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God. (Jer. 2: 19.)

A Signal Hidden

A strange cause is assigned for an accident which occurred on the Boston and Maine Railroad near Worces-ter, Mass., on October 2. The engineer of a passenger train from Worcester to Nashua, N. H., attempted to run his train on to the main track, passing in front of a heavy freight train which was coming at a rapid pace down-grade. The engineer of the freight did his utmost to avert a collision, but the speed it had attained owing to its weight and the steep incline rendered his effort futile. Eight passengers were so severely injured that no hopes of their lives are entertained and many others received painful contusions and bruises. Asked how it was that he disregarded the signal set against him, the engineer of the passenger declared that he did not see the signal; the steam from his locomotive was so dense that it completely shut off his view; and in this state-ment he is corroborated by his fireman, both men being careful men with unblem-ished records. It is a signifi-cant thing that the steam, the source of power, should have become in this instance the cause of destruction. The principle, unhappily, goes further in the realm of morals and religion. The knowledge so essential to a useful life may make a man vain so that he fails to heed the warnings God gives him.

Knowledge puffeth up but love edifieth. And if any man thinks that he knoweth anything, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. (I. Cor. 8: 1, 2.)

Relics of an Extinct Race

A remarkable discovery has been made by Professor Saville of Columbia Univer-sity. He has been traveling in South America and has recently returned. Writing to the New York Times, he says that while exploring the region between Peru and Panama, he was interested in the appearance of a range of low hills. On climbing them he discovered among a jungle like growth of vege-tation, the relics of an extinct civilization entirely distinct from those of the Incas and Aztecs, though rivaling them in skill and culture. Prof. Saville believes these people to have been a very ancient race, of which the Indians whom Cieza de Leon describes as living in that region in Pizarro's day were the debased descendants. The Indians, De Leon says, had a tradition of a race of giants who were able to dig wells in the living rock. A corrobora-tive fact is that Prof. Saville found a number of these wells among the ruins, which must have required power-ful and sharp tools to bore. He found the ruins of large houses on the summit of the hills, some of which con-tained seven rooms. There was one forty feet wide with walls four feet thick. He thinks this must have been used as a council house. It contained a number of stone chairs, unique in the district and utterly beyond the skill of the Indians. They were massive and beautifully sculptured with figures sometimes human and sometimes animal. He also found indications of their worship on the site of a temple in which sacrifices had been offered, and there were stones which appeared to have served as a support to incense burners. Further explorations are expected to reveal some clue to the identity of this unknown but clearly highly civilized race. It is significant that of such a race the only definite knowledge we have is that they offered sacrifices. It shows how ancient and how widespread is the idea of God and human guilt, and the conception of substitution.

Which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts meanwhile accusing or excusing one another. (Rom. 2: 15.)

Questioned if she did not regret the surrender of her operatic career, she replied: "It is not one's art nor one's self, but one's work, which stands as the real thing of importance. I think I have chosen the better part of life. I am free to come and go as I please; and how much better it is that these poor souls, who could never afford the opera, can still be reached by a little consideration.

"While I am interested in the welfare of the prisoners, I am more deeply concerned with the condition of the prisoners' families that have been deprived of support. Many of the little children are destitute, and I have often taken clothes to meet their urgent needs."

The Countess, however, has not confined her ministrations to the missions alone. I have met her at many places, and wherever I found her the same benevolent smile and active sympathies communicated her own cheerfulness to every one around her.

Just at present she is actively at work founding a home for the children of criminals. But the story of her plans is best told by herself.

"While I am interested in the welfare of the prisoners, I am more deeply concerned with the prisoners' families that have been deprived of support. Many of the little children are destitute and I have often taken clothes to meet their urgent needs. I am now trying to found a hor where the families of prisoners may kept until the parents are released. will be an asylum for the children t year around.

"At first I shall look about (as soon our committee is formed) for a desirab farm to let for the purpose, where t "Home" may be started until funds a procured to purchase a tract. At prese it is impossible to state where funds a clothing may be sent, as the plans a not perfected; but in a few weeks I ho our plans will be published. We wa to make good citizens of the poor unfo tunates. They will be taught by co petent teachers, will have plenty of fre air and good wholesome food. The gi will be taught to sew and keep hous the boys to farm. This effort to make r spectable citizens of these little unfort nates appeals to me as none other can. sincerely hope that this refuge, the proje of building which is with me night a day, may soon be an accomplished fa and I am convinced that it will be a gre blessing to many." ✳ GREETING STRANGERS IN CHURCH ✳

By KATE UPSON CLARK

THE recent tempest in a teapot, aroused by Miss Smith's visit to the New York meeting-houses, brings to mind certain illuminative stories, which, if she had heard them before she started on her campaign, might have deterred her from attempting it.

Some years ago, a gentleman and his wife attended a new church in Brookyn in order to hear the preacher, who was an old friend of theirs. On the way out, their hands were seized by a cordial deacon, who besought them warmly to come again. At the door, another effusive brother shook hands with them and thanked them for coming, hoping that every future Sunday would also find them there.

As soon as the husband and wife were well out of hearing of the good brethren, the gentleman said in a tone of horror, "Let us never go there again. Wasn't it dreadful to be welcomed in that way?"

The wife was not sure.

"They certainly meant to be kind," she said, "and it is a Christian way. Isn't it a little rude and unsympathetic to feel offended with such good people?"

"No," insisted the husband. "Such a greeting isn't in good taste, and I shall never enter that church again, until I am assured that I shall not be met in that way."

Which shows how one sort of people feel about being "welcomed" in strange churches, though Miss Smith and a good many others might have liked those handshakes and the invitations to come again.

In another of our large Brooklyn churches a certain prominent Brooklyn lady, whose name would be recognized by most of those who read these lines, was deputed to stand at the door as the congregation dispersed, and "speak kindly" to such ladies as appeared to be strangers. She had been a member of the church for four or five years, and active in the philanthropic organizations. But it had a large membership, and no one person—not even the faithful pastor—could know them all, so rapidly did the church constituency change.

For a few Sundays she got along pretty well. Then came trouble. One very elegant lady, whom our friend did not remember ever to have seen before, came sweeping along.

"I am very glad to see you here," said the committee, sweetly. "Please come often."

"I probably shall," replied madame haughtily, "since I have been a member of this church for twenty years—long before you ever saw the place."

The committee went home and wept, and could never muster up courage again to stand at the door of the synagogue making the "strangers" welcome.

The late Dr. Edward P. Ingersoll, whose fund of capital stories many Brooklynites remember, had a good one in this line. He was attending commencement at a certain college when one prominent New Yorker whom he knew went up to another one, his classmate, and said cordially, "Jack, how are you? I haven't seen you since we graduated. Where are you living?"

"In New York."

"So am I. What street?"

"East Fifty-seventh."

"Well, well! and I am on West Fifty-sixth. Where do you go to church?"

"Dr. John Hall's."

"So do I. I have been there for a dozen years or more. It must be that you sit on the other aisle. I am on the left."

"Yes, that's it. I am on the right."

They parted, resolving that they would try to see each other oftener in the future.

Now in a city in which members of th same church find it impossible to kn their fellow members, how can they ke track of the strangers within their gate It may be wrong that we cannot bett know and more deeply sympathize wi those around us in this great city, especial our own church brethren; but the comp cations and the pressure of life here ke most of us from seeing our best belov friends, except at rare intervals. A there are so many frauds and so many w address us without any claim, that a hab of reticence and the desire to be let alo become a sort of second nature to m of us.

Free seats, free service, free Sund Schools are everywhere. The pastor nearly every evangelical church in Great New York invites strangers to speak write to him. That seems to be as mu as can properly be provided at present.

And yet it is saddening that any o should leave the house of God feeling th she has been unwelcome. If she tho oughly understands our city, she must s that no slight is intended.

But it may be a good thing that t matter has been stirred up. Better a kinder conditions may be devised in co sequence.

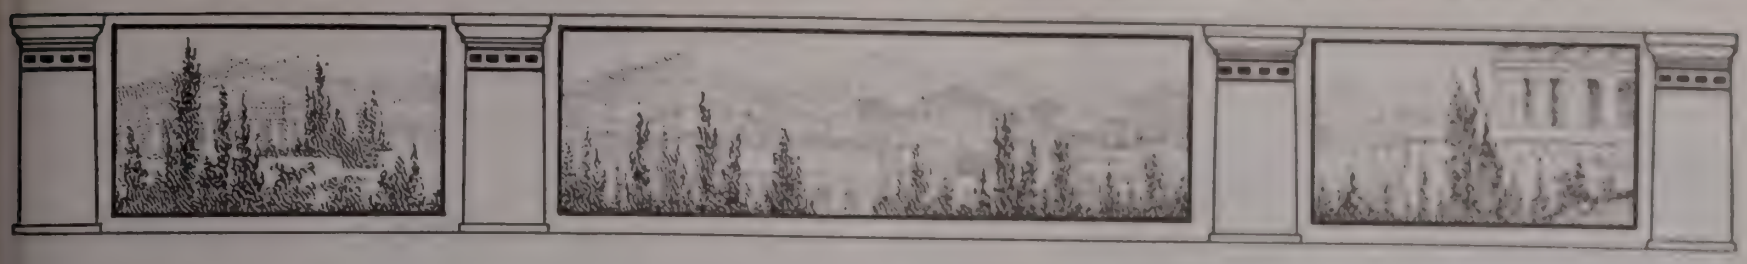
IN PLEASANT AUTUMN DAYS



Our Shut-in Friends

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AMONG our readers we count as among the most beloved and precious, not a few who are invalids encompassed by infirmity and familiar with pain, dear ones who are shut in from the activities of the outside world. Others go about with freedom while they are chained to the bed or couch. Others take journeys. They are glad if they may sit by a window and get a peep at what is passing in the street. One patient sufferer whom I well remember had for seventeen long years spent her time in one small room above the little shop where her husband mended shoes. The couple were Germans and nearly all their kinsfolk were in the Fatherland. Their children had died in infancy, and they were lonely and poor, but they had one another, they had faith in God and they had true love. The man would run up from his cobbler's bench to carry his wife her meals, to help her from her bed to her chair, and to tell her little snatches of anecdotes that he heard from his customers. On Sunday afternoons the girls in a Bible class came from a neighboring church by twos or threes, climbed the little stairway and sang to this lovely old lady whose sufferings had never made her fretful or bitter. She always had a smiling welcome for a visitor, and she was sometimes heard to say that when the sun shone in her room and the canary in the cage warbled its sweetest, and she heard the click of her good man's hammer from the room below, she envied no one on earth. The peace of God glowed in her homely face.

Another shut-in of whom I think was tripping along to school one day when she was only sixteen, and a little misstep with a trifling fall so injured her knee that she became a cripple. Her parents were poor and little was done at first for the injury. When weeks had gone by she was taken to a hospital, but it was too late for a cure and she spent years of her youth as a shut-in. I have never known any one more constantly cheery, more resolutely brave and more determined to look on the bright side, than this young girl.

Our shut-in friends often shame us by their persistent optimism. We, in the full tide of health and vigor, wonder how they bear the dreary days; but to them the days are not always dreary, especially if they are not merely resigned, but are serene in their acceptance of the will of God.

May we not have a duty in relation to our shut-in acquaintances? If so, are we paying our obligation or are we neglecting an opportunity? An unexpected letter coming as a sweet surprise in the morning mail, a beautiful picture postal, an interesting book, a growing plant, materials and explanations for some work that eyes and hands may do, although one is confined to her room—these are among the thoughtful little things that brighten an invalid's day. We ought not to make the mistake of supposing that we can give pleasure or relief only by spending money.

Some years ago in an outlying portion of Greater New York a woman, widowed and very poor, was doing her brave best to bring up and educate her children. A lad in the neighborhood fell through an elevator shaft and his lower limbs were paralyzed. The injury was incurable. He could never walk again. His people could not maintain him in their own home, yet he begged piteously not to be sent to an institution. The neighbor, her hands already full, said, "Let the boy come to me." He was brought, and she cared for him for nearly ten years with motherly patience and heroic love. Friends contributed to pay for some of his necessities and to purchase for him a rolling chair, but the ministries of affection that were given him without money and without price came from the hands of a stranger.

In this world of ours there is no end of kindness, if we can but have our attention called to the individual and the want. Are our shut-in friends lonely? Let us take time to visit them. Do they need comfort or hope? Somebody surely has something to spare in the line of sympathy. Can we not form partnerships in the cheering-up business?

It isn't the thing you do, dear,
  It's the thing you leave undone
That gives you a bit of heartache
  At the setting of the sun.
The tender word forgotten,
  The letter you did not write,
The flower you might have sent, dear,
  Are your haunting ghosts at night.

The stone you might have lifted
  Out of a brother's way,
The bit of heartsome counsel
  You were hurried too much to say,
The loving touch of the hand, dear,
  And the gentle, winning tone
That you had no time nor thought for
  With troubles enough of your own.

These little acts of kindness
  So easily out of mind,
These chances to be angels
  That we poor mortals find;
They come in night and silence,
  Each chill, reproachful wraith,
When hope is faint and flagging,
  And a blight has fallen on faith.

And it isn't the thing you do, dear,
  It's the thing you leave undone
That gives you a bit of a heartache
  At the setting of the sun.

PUBLIC SCRIBES IN STAMBOUL

IN Oriental countries, where the lines are drawn with sharp distinctness between the educated and illiterate portions of a community, the man who knows how to write is in great demand, and can drive a profitable trade, while accommodating his neighbors, by the exercise of his art. Just as in our Lord's day in Judea, the scribes in Stamboul may be seen in public places to-day with the implements of their work.

A Surprising Premium

Dear Dr. Klopsch: On my return home from my summer outing, I found your generous, handsome premium awaiting me, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts," for which I send you my most hearty thanks. You have certainly given me a great deal for my money.

Philadelphia, Pa. JULIA P. KNEEDLER.

Delinquent Children

JUVENILE delinquents are not necessarily depraved or degenerate specimens of childhood, although they are objects of concern on the part of society. Unless they are recovered and guided into safer ways, they will eventually become a menace and a terror, drift into the ranks of the vicious and vagrant classes, and almost inevitably swell the number of culprits and criminals who come before the courts. Small boys from well-ordered homes may sometimes feel within them the call of the wild, and occasionally taste the questionable sweets of truancy. But they are not habitual truants; their sin finds them out, and is duly punished by loving parents and guardians, if not by teachers. Juvenile delinquents are not the product of affectionate, gentle-mannered and conscientious Christian homes. Loving fathers and mothers and unbridled freedom in the streets are at the back of childish waywardness. In several of the larger cities, women are employed as truant officers, and they have had remarkable success in discovering youthful offenders and gradually bringing them into the right relation to the social order.

What the boy starting wrong needs is the magnetism of sympathy, an honest belief in his power and a wish to do better, and some normal outlet for his activity. Convinced that somebody cares, that somebody expects much of him, and that there is an opportunity for him to do well, in nine out of ten cases a little fellow will right-about-face, leave the down grade and climb up hill, finally to take his place among those who do good service to the country and the age.

About Engagements

A change has taken place in reference to the announcement of an engagement to be married. Formerly, a betrothed couple made known their decision to their acquaintances very soon after they had reached it themselves. At present, it is usual to reserve the information until within a month or two of the date fixed for the wedding. For many reasons this is an improvement on the old custom. The fact that the engagement is not announced leaves both parties more at liberty in general society, and relieves them from the embarrassment of comment, and from the obligation to appear constantly together. If, unhappily, there arise difficulty between them and the engagement is broken, as sometimes happens, there are no disagreeable explanations due to the circle of their friends. Six weeks is a very convenient and quite sufficient period to elapse between the announcement of an engagement and the wedding day.

An engagement may be announced by the prospective bride in notes to her friends, or at a luncheon or afternoon reception. If she prefers to have her mother make the announcement, she may do so verbally or by letter to interested relatives and friends. Notification of the engagement may be made by the man to his friends if he chooses.

FLEEING FROM THE AVENGER

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AS Election Day is at hand it will be timely to study the foundations of government in Israel. Our own laws come mostly from Moses, on whose code are based the codes of Justinian, Charlemagne and Alfred.

Over the plain a manslayer is running for his life. He is dressed in the shepherd's garb, but he has cast off nearly all his garments, that he may run the faster. He hopes to reach the city of Bezer before the avenger, who is pursuing hard after him. The gate of the city is flung wide open, and once within its portals, the shepherd has nothing to fear, for he has not committed murder. In protecting his sheep against wolves, he threw his heavy club, and it struck Nathan, one of his assistants, and killed him. The avenger is Othniel, the brother of Nathan. If he overtakes the slayer before he reaches the gate he will be his executioner, but Othniel is so sure the slaying was accidental that he is glad to be outrun, and no more blood is shed.

The Race for Life

Another race for life is before us. The manslayer's garments are bloody, because he has been in close combat with the man he has killed. Will he reach the city of Golan, just ahead, before the avenger can seize upon him? He trips and falls just before he reaches the gate, and is slain by the avenger. He would have met death shortly if he had succeeded in reaching the city, for he would have been found to be a guilty murderer by the judges, and they would have delivered him, after a trial, to the avenger to do his deadly work.

We are standing at the gate of the city of Shechem. Darkness is coming on, and we can hardly see, but we hear the noise of swift running, and suddenly, almost as an arrow, a man speeds by us, and enters the city through the ever open gate. The avenger is not a minute behind him, and more bloodthirsty than usual he seems, for he knows that he has a case. He rushes into the city after the man, and tells the judges: "This man is a most quarrelsome fellow; always in trouble with his neighbors. He has been known to sow tares in a neighbor's wheat-field, and he has even removed his neighbor's landmark to enlarge his own possessions; and furthermore, I have picked up this bloody knife which he dropped while he was running." "We will try the case to-morrow," say the judges, "and until then let both of you rest in peace."

We turn our eyes to the south, and see a runner of alien bearing, for he is a Kenezite. The avenger is an Israelite. Both are making for the city of Hebron. Can it be that the "stranger" will find protection there, for he has killed an Israelite? When his case comes up before the judges they find that his ax had slipped from the handle, and struck a man with whom he was working, killing him. The judges say to the avenger: "You must depart, for the killing was clearly accidental." And they say to the manslayer, "Your life is as safe as if you were an Israelite while you remain in this city, or within a thousand yards beyond. If you go further than that, we cannot protect you against the manslayer. Here you must live until the high priest dies; after that you can go where you please and be safe."

Justice and Mercy

I. Justice established! II. Mercy illustrated! Justice and social order were promoted as shown in the lesson story: (1) By the law "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," which proclaimed and safeguarded the sacredness of life, in the interest of social peace as well as individual and family welfare; (2) by making the nearest relative of a slain man responsible for the punishment of the slayer in that rude age when there were few officials; (3) by guarding through cities of refuge against passionate and indiscriminate punishment of accidental killing as if it had been wilful murder; (4) by requiring examination into the circumstances and motives of each killing; (5) by the delivery of the slayer, if found on fair trial to be a murderer, for execution by the avenger of blood; (6) by protecting the accidental slayer against capital punishment; (7) by punishing him nevertheless for his carelessness or anger by exile from his home and business in and near the city of refuge until the death of the high priest; (8) by providing that all these safeguards of justice should be available for the foreigner no less than the native Israelite.

A comparison of the law of refuge in Israel with those of other primitive peoples shows that justice was much more honored where the code of Moses was in force, confirming his claim that he was taught of God. For example, in Samoa not only the accidental slayer but the wilful murderer finds safe refuge, without trial, in the house of the chief of another village to whom he is some way related on his father's or mother's side. The Arabs and Chinese of to-day will kill an innocent kinsman of the slayer if they cannot reach the slayer himself. In Israel utmost care was taken to show that a manslayer was not a murderer; for example, by showing he had no murderous weapon (Num. 35: 16-23; Exod. 21: 13; Deut. 19: 1-3). "To establish justice," one avowed purpose of the American Constitution, as of all civilized government, was clearly the purpose of the cities of refuge, which were Levitical cities where the purest and ablest men of Israel would be the judges.

We may well pause, before using the refuge city as an illustration of mercy, to emphasize its much needed picture of divine and social justice; for many cities to-day are refuges for wilful guilt, where juries and judges and the public show more mercy to the maudlin criminal than to his victim or to the imperiled community. And this maudlin mercy is by such cities attributed also to the Judge of all the earth, and so becomes an encouragement to sin. This luxurious, easy-going age, that talks much of God's love, but little of his law, needs such a picture of justice as Emerson gives:

> My will fulfilled shall be,
> For in daylight or in dark,
> My thunderbolt has eyes to see
> Its way home to his mark.

No one is prepared to understand or receive the atonement who does not appreciate how essential and majestic is justice in the government of the universe. The first meaning of the cross is the grandeur of justice and the awfulness of sin. If sin be only a trifle, to be forgiven offhand like some social slip whenever a sinner says to God, "I beg your pardon," then Jesus Christ died for nothing at all. But if, as he taught and his disciples also, it is so important to "establish justice" in the universe that man's sin can only be forgiven when the very Prince of heaven has suffered in man's stead, then justice is shown to be an essential attribute of God and of all good men, and sin is seen to be "exceedingly sinful" as an offense against justic Mercy is thus seen to be not a matter by itself, bu justice and mercy stand together, like Jachin and Boa pillars of strength and beauty, upholding the throne o God, and the order of the universe, and the peace o society, and the harmony of the soul.

Let us not call the refuge city a type of Christ, fo it is not. It was a refuge only for the innocent, an its salvation was by the Law. But there is much in th cities of refuge that illustrates, partly by contrast an partly by resemblance, the refuge that God's merc provides in Christ. 1. Every person who has com to years of choice and responsibility (eight is the age o crime capacity in court decisions, and sin come earlier yet) has done or said or thought what i wrong, or failed to do or say what is right, and s needs a refuge against the consequences of violatin God's law (Rom. 3: 23; 6: 23). 2. Christ offers i himself a refuge to all, even the most wilful sinner on condition of repentance and trusting acceptance o his death as a substitute for the sinner. 3. Thi Christian refuge benefits only those who seek it. 4 This refuge is so near that the weakest can reach it b one step of the will (Psa. 34: 18). 5. This refuge i Christ benefits only those who remain in it (Jer. 6: 16) 6. There is only one "Way" to this refuge in Chris for guilty souls.

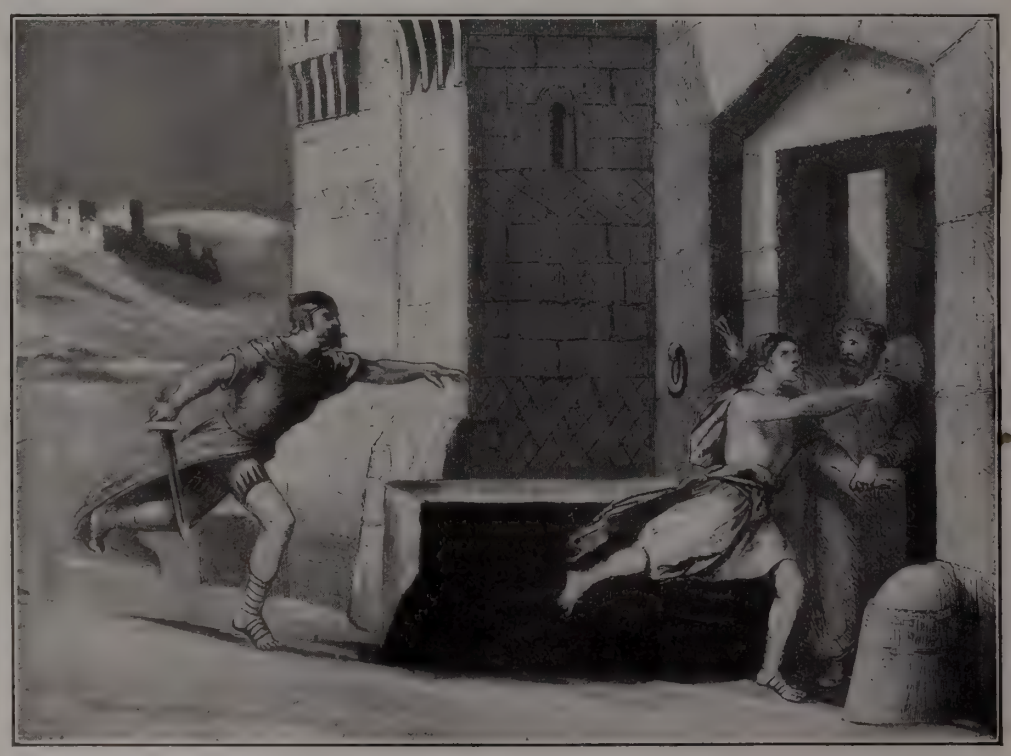
A Boy Self-Convicted

A refuge for the guilty we all need. God's word fo it, "All have sinned" (Rom. 3: 22, 23). A boy te years old was asked by a preacher if he knew himsel to be a sinner. "Oh, no, sir, I am not a sinner. I am good boy. My big brother is sinner, and a man in our street i a sinner, for he gets tipsy." Bu my dear boy, you are a sinne yourself." "No, sir, I am good boy. Mother says so. "But have you never in you life done anything wrong Have you never been disobe dient?" Well, yes, sir, some times." "And have you neve told an untruth?" "Yes, bu not very often." "And hav you ever taken things that di not belong to you?" "Yes, si I'm afraid I have." Here wa a boy ten years old who ha broken at least three of th Ten Commandments; had dis obeyed his parents, lied repeat edly, and stolen; and yet h did not consider himself a sin ner. If he sought refuge i the city of justice there woul be no chance for him. It i only in the city of mercy suc a soul can find safety, an there by pardon that is give only to the penitent. "Whos covereth his sin shall not pros per, but whoso confesseth an forsaketh them shall hav mercy" is the divine rule.

Our refuge at hand. Thoug the six cities of refuge wer located all over Palestine, fo many an endangered man thei safety could only be secured b miles of swift running, and n doubt many a runner failed fo lack of strength. No one nee fail to enter the refuge Christ provides, for it is al ways at hand. There was a fire in London, near St Paul's, in an apartment above a shop standing at th corner of a narrow court. A ladder was quickl raised, but only two women could be found. Thes were rescued, and just as they reached a place o safety the roof fell in. Had the firemen saved all?

Down in Paternoster Row, crowded with would-b sightseers, kept back from the burning building b policemen, an elderly man was the centre of attraction He had escaped—just in time—but not by the help o the firemen. "We were at work," he said, "in the fla below the one on fire, when the smell of fire warned u of danger. Then we jumped to our feet pretty quick I can tell you! One rushed to the windows, but they were too high up to jump from. Another opened th door on to the landing, but the smoke and flames rush ing in showed there was no chance that way. We ha just given ourselves up for lost, when all at once w heard a great shout from the other side of the court followed by a bang against our window which looke out that way. In a trice we had it open, and lo! there was a ladder which our neighbor on the other side had thrust across from his window. We crept over, one by one, on our hands and knees."

Here is a picture of imperiled souls—ignorant o danger, unable to save themselves; salvation is brought to their very hands.



"If the avenger of blood pursue after him then they shall not deliver the slayer up"

* The International Sunday School Lesson for November 3. The Cities of Refuge. Joshua 20: 1-9. GOLDEN TEXT: My Refuge is in God. Ps. 62: 7.

PARABLES IN MODERN DRESS

"Some fell upon stony places, but others fell into good ground"

"'I thank thee that I am not as other men are'"

MANY people have the impression that the teachings of Jesus had to do with an age long past and a civilization widely different from ours. They did apply to that age and clime, but they have just as pertinent an application to this century and to our own manner of life. His principles were of such a character that they suited any age, for, being divine, they are eternal. "He is the same yesterday, to-day and forever."

A conclusive proof of the fact is seen in the four pictures on this page. They are the work of the brilliant artist, Arthur E. Becher, and are published, with four other pictures and an introduction by Dr. Lyman Abbott, in a beautifully decorated $2.50 book, by D. Appleton & Company, of New York. They show that among ourselves there are to-day illustrations of the characters and events which Jesus described, and that the lessons he inculcated are needed now as much as in his time.

Mr. Becher has skilfully used in his illustration of the Parable of the Sower, the explanation Christ gave of the parable. "The seed," Christ said, "was the Word of God," and in the audience gathered around the street preacher may be seen specimens of each of the soils on which it fell, from the sleeping man in the foreground to the eager listeners near the preacher. His conception of the welcome to the Prodigal is a variation of sex. The wayward daughter with her sad face needs most bitterly the welcome that the son in the parable received. In his study of the Parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, the artist has depicted a scene in a church aisle, where the humble worshiper drops his coin into the box that the typical wealthy usher holds out to him. The last illustration is that of the Lost Sheep, which the heart-broken widow finds clad in convict stripes in a prison cell. Her pitiful face and her caressing hand show that she has in her heart the tenderness of that great Shepherd of the Sheep.

We may hope that these pictures will lead some to realize that in our modern life there are opportunities for all to heed the lessons the parables of Jesus were designed to teach.

"'I will arise and go to my father'"

"'I have found my sheep which was lost'"

Questions and Answers

I. L., Greenwich, N. Y. When and by whom was the city of Cambridge, Mass., founded?

The town was founded by Governor Winthrop, in 1630, and called Newtown. The name was soon changed to Cambridge, on account of the number of graduates of Cambridge University, England, who were among the first settlers.

F. S., Turkey City, Pa. 1. Is there any book printed that explains the Book of Revelation? 2. Where can I get the book entitled Royal Path of Life? 3. My work keeps me on duty from 7 A.M. till 6 P.M. daily the year round, Sundays included, excepting vacation. I cannot get to church until I get off duty at 6 P.M. Am I doing wrong to keep at it?

1. Many books have been written on Revelation, but probably the best for your purpose is that written by Rev. Dr. Seiss of Philadelphia. If there is a good Bible Commentary available for reference in your neighborhood, it will help you greatly. 2. You probably mean the Pathway of Life, by Dr. Talmage. It is now out of print. 3. The deprivation of religious privileges, occasioned by Sunday work, is a serious objection. If you recognize it as such, you should take the first opportunity to make a change, if conditions cannot be improved.

Reader, Norfolk, Va. What is the correct pronunciation of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the city in San Luis Potosi, Mexico?

It is pronounced Gua-da-loo-pa he-dal-go.

Iowa Reader. How large is Central Park, New York City?

It extends from Fifty-ninth Street to One-hundred-and-tenth Street, 13,507 feet. It is 2,718 feet wide, with an area of 862 acres. There are over twenty-eight miles of walks, five and a quarter of bridle paths, and nine miles of road. The park was laid out in 1858, when it was hardly touched by the northern suburbs of the city. Now it is in the centre of New York. Frederick L. Olmsted and Calvert Vaux were the landscape architects.

Jessie J., Covington, Ky. Was kissing ever considered an act of worship or anything more than a mere friendly salutation or lovers' greeting?

Yes, it was recognized as an act of worship or adoration. To kiss the hand or the hem of the garment was to humble oneself in adoration. The word "adore" itself signifies simply to carry the hand to the mouth and kiss it in salutation. In Psalm 2: 12 the expression "kiss the Son" means to worship.

W. W. W., Lime Spring, Ia. After reading, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 2, the verses "Through the Gin-Mill Door," the question came to me: Is not each person who continues to support a power that opens the gin-mill door, directly responsible for the fearful degradation and misery that pass through it?

The question is one that carries its own answer. Not one party, but all parties, share the responsibility. The reformation, therefore, must be general, before the land is redeemed from the curse of drink.

W. A. L., Burnside, Ky. Please tell me what denomination Evangelist W. A. Sunday belongs to.

Mr. Sunday is a Presbyterian, we believe. Don't know about the other mentioned in your letter.

F. E. B., Jennings, N. C. 1. Where can I get the history written by Josephus? 2. Why is Korea called the Hermit Nation? 3. What is materialism?

1. Revell & Co., publishers, New York. 2. Because of its isolation for many centuries. It is also called the "Land of the Sunrise" and "Land of the Morning Calm." 3. That system of philosophy which considers matter as the fundamental principle of all things, and consequently denies absolutely the independence and autonomy of the spirit.

L. H., New Britain, Conn. Judas' thirty pieces of silver—what was their equivalent in our money?

In the Oxford Helps to Bible Study, it is stated at $16.96. Other authorities vary, up to $24.

C. T., Toledo, O. When was the famous Cumberland Road started?

In 1806 an Act was passed by Congress to lay out a public road from Cumberland, Md., on the Potomac, to the Ohio River, and $30,000 was appropriated for its construction. The road was added to until it reached Illinois, in 1838. Further work was then stopped, as railroads had been introduced.

Reader, Hillsboro, O. In what sense can Lot be considered a righteous man as stated by Peter (II. Peter 2:7)?

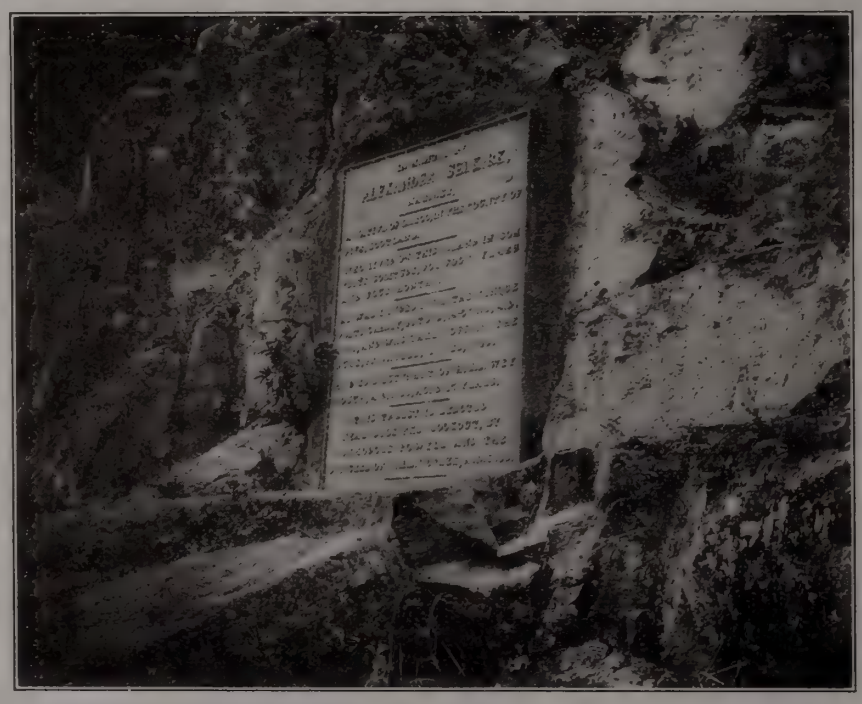
The narrative in Genesis deals with his faults rather than with his virtues. It must be supposed, however, that he was relatively righteous, as he was deemed worthy of an angelic deliverance from Sodom. Peter seems to have had access to facts or traditions not recorded in Genesis. From him we learn for the first time that he was vexed by the wickedness around him. He may have been personally righteous, but was evidently timid, avaricious and selfish. There are many men who have those faults who are nevertheless not destitute of good qualities.

R. A., Minier, Ill. Could you tell me the main reasons why Latin is more important in connection with high school work than German?

For the reason that our own English, the French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian and German are in great part based on Latin, and contain many Latin words, German and English less than the others, but it plays an important part in both. The title of the German Emperor, Kaiser, for instance, is a form of the Latin word Cæsar. One who studies Latin finds it a great help in the study of all the others. If he took German he would have that and nothing else. The great literature of ancient times is Latin literature, and all literatures owe it much. German literature ranks well with others of modern times, but has not great influence on American literature as yet.

Subscriber, Ventura, Calif. What is the meaning of remitting and retaining sin in John 20: 23?

The words are often used by Roman Catholics to justify the absolution given by the priest on confession. It is, however, inconceivable that Christ intended to place such absolute power in the hands of a fallible being. It may have been that the power was confided to the apostles only, they being endowed, as the previous verse shows, with the Holy Spirit in that special sense that their mission required. Or, as Farrar contended, that the preacher has the power of declaring the conditions under which sins are permitted or retained. As a preacher might tell a man that if he retains, or continues to commit, certain sins, he will perish, which assertion he makes on Scriptural authority.



ROBINSON CRUSOE ISLAND

LITTLE more than a year ago a report reached us from Chile that Juan Fernandez, Robinson Crusoe's Island, had been swallowed by the sea. Later, the report was found to be incorrect. As long ago as 1563, a Spanish pilot discovered the island and gave it his own name. More than a hundred years later, Alexander Selkirk had a quarrel with the captain of his own ship, and requested to be put ashore; his request was granted, and though he repented the next day and asked to be taken on board, he was refused and for over four years he had a solitary existence. His experience furnished the suggestion for Defoe's Robinson Crusoe. About two hundred feet from shore is the cave where it is generally believed Crusoe lived. Near Crusoe's Lookout is the memorial tablet to Selkirk. It was erected in 1868 by officers of the British ship Topaze. Selkirk died an officer in the British navy in 1723.

ELSIE MAYNARD STOCKTON.

The American consul at Monrovia, Africa, sends this official notice of the death of a faithful missionary, whose passing away was mentioned in this paper some time ago:

LOUIS KLOPSCH, ESQ., CHRISTIAN HERALD, NEW YORK.
Sir: I beg to inform you of the death of Mrs. Mary Louisa Allen, American missionary at Nanna Kru, in whose work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD seems to be interested. Mrs. Allen died at Nanna Kru, nearly two hundred miles from Monrovia. At the time of her death, there was living on the mission property with her a young man from America by the name of F. M. Cook, but he died about two weeks after Mrs. Allen, so that the mission has been temporarily closed. Mr. Cook had only been in the country about two months prior to his death. I think the branch work which she conducted at Battoo, a native village about thirty miles from Nanna Kru, is still in operation under the management of a native worker. Mrs. Allen having died intestate, her effects have been taken over by the American Consul General at Monrovia to await the claim of her legal heir.

ERNEST LYON, Consul General.

L. T. S., Swainton, N. J. From what manuscript was our Bible translated? Are they now in existence? In what language are they written?

The men who prepared the Authorized or King James edition of the Bible, consulted all the then known manuscripts. The Old Testament copies were in Hebrew, and they doubtless had access to the Greek translation known as the Septuagint. The Jews had been very careful to have these manuscripts absolutely accurate, so that it did not signify nor is it known what particular manuscript was used. Probably several translators had copies. They are the same as those still in use in Jewish synagogues. The earliest New Testament manuscripts are in Greek. The translators had a choice of about thirty of these, some of them dating back to the fourth century. They are still in existence and copies of them may still be seen in the great libraries. Since the translation of the Authorized Version was made, still older manuscripts have been found which were examined by the Revisers in preparing the Revised Version.

Friend, Buffalo, N. Y. There is no real basis for your opinion. You have been led to put a wrong interpretation on the epistles. In any case there is no continuance of the practice. The course you propose would be a State's prison offense.

A Grand Book Greatly Valued

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your handsome book, "The Great Hereafter," has just reached me. It is a grand book, which I shall value very much indeed. I am so very pleased with it, I am only sorry I had not sent for it earlier. CHARLES CHILTON.

TOMMY

By E. RYERSON YOUNG, Jr.

MR. REGINALD ST. CLAIR and his handsome son, Gerald, clad in broadcloth and top hats, swept up the church aisle. Two ushers sprang to lead the way and open the door of the St. Clair pew. This pew might command the attention of any one interested in rich upholstery, beauty of coloring and comfort. With a bow of patronage and pleasure to the ushers, Mr. St. Clair and his son stepped into the pew and took their seats.

Behind these elegant gentlemen came two other persons; a poor widow, by the name of Edwards, with a faded bonnet on her head, a shawl over her shoulders, and, by her side, a son clad in coarse gray tweed. Very quietly they came to the church door, entered with bowed heads and took their places in the rear, bare pews. In spite of all her week's labor at the wash-tub and the pickings Tommy had made after school hours running errands, they had but ten cents each for the collection plate. They felt almost ashamed to present such a pittance to the Lord who had given them so much of his saving grace and wonderful love. Still they were delighted to have something and so they joined in the service of praise. Then after the benediction was pronounced, they went away as quietly as they came, with hearts full of the message of love.

Mr. St. Clair said something to Gerald about the poor singing of the quartette of the day. The young man laughed and passed a comment upon the attitude of the preacher towards stock-broking.

"If I had noticed that before I should have stopped my envelope," Mr. St. Clair said quickly.

"You only gave a five, anyway, father. It's a mere pittance and not worth bothering about."

But there was a cloud on Mr. St. Clair's brow as he walked down the church aisle with many people bowing to him. The ushers opened the door and the footman had the door of his motor car ready to admit him to his seat. Gerald followed his father. He bowed to the many friends who had recognized him and his father, had a few words with several fashionably dressed young ladies and their escorts, and then hastened away.

Sunday followed Sunday. Mr. St. Clair and Gerald were regularly found in their pew. Mr. St. Clair withheld his weekly contribution for a few Sundays until the preacher apologized for what he had said; then he renewed his offering of five dollars a Sunday and subscribed generously to extra claims.

Tommy Edwards and his mother were so faithful in their attendance upon the place of worship. He was steadily advancing in his studies, and their claims for fees and books and time kept him and his mother busy to find the weekly attance for the Lord. There were times when Tommy had suggested that it be kept for bread, but with an exclamation of determined faith his mother had said that she would starve first.

One week the church treasurer met her and asked her to make her contribution twenty-five cents a week.

"I'll pray about it," said the widow, bravely keeping back the tears.

In the Mission Sunday School, an offshoot of the great church, Tommy found Christian work in teaching a little class of rough boys. His soul went out to them and he was enabled to lead one after another to Christ and to help them on to nobler and cleaner ways of life. This filled his heart and his mother's heart with great rejoicing. Then Tommy won a scholarship that entitled him to a year in a university.

Two years ahead of him in the university, Gerald St. Clair was doing good work. His cleverness in his studies and his abundance of wealth and sociability made him a general favorite. When Tommy presented himself to the college, Gerald welcomed him in a sophomore's patronizing way. Gerald had the strong muscles of an athlete, but his nerves and complexion were beginning to have telltale marks of dissipation.

"Too bad you haven't a pot of money, Tommy, so that you could enjoy a full university course, you know," he said.

"He found work in teaching a class of rough boys"

"Thank you for your welcome and well wishes, Mr. St. Clair," said Tommy. "I'll have to walk a humbler path and be sharp to make good use of my holidays to get enough money to continue my college course, for this scholarship that I have got is only for one year."

"Win another."

"I shall certainly try to, but there are hard men to work against."

"Well, goodby. I'm sorry for you. You don't get much good of the university if you miss the clubs and sports."

And, with a flourish, Gerald went away. Tommy saw very little of him during the rest of his college life.

Tommy took the humbler path of diligent study and regular habits. He did not win a scholarship in the second year, but a position was found for him in the college, and this continued his course.

One of the professors taking an interest in Tommy taught him how to run his motor-boat and took him the following holidays to his summer home, a fairy land of lakes and rivers. Tommy was exceedingly thankful. He made good use of his spare moments, reading in the professor's library. He found work the next term in the Y. M. C. A. His summer study and his term work told in his third year and he won another scholarship, which gave him time to spend the whole of his fourth year at his studies, and it also permitted him to help his mother. That was a great year for both of them. It was Tommy's homestretch in the university. Medals and prizes and post-graduate fellowships meant much to him, not only in themselves, but, for a young man like him, they were stepping-stones for larger things in the good life that was beyond.

His term work was so brilliant that he moved up into the first rank and his pastor was attracted to him. This elegant minister was at first somewhat surprised to find that Tommy was the son of a humble washerwoman who attended his church regularly. But he recovered from his shock when his better spirit learned that Tommy had been a soul-winner in the Mission Church and had done good work in the Y. M. C. A.

"We'll have the boy for the ministry," he said in his study, as he rose from his knees, where he had been praying to God to forgive him for neglecting the widow and the other poor.

He hastened to Tommy and laid plans before him for entering the ministry. Tommy shrank from them. The minister's eyes brightened with delight. He talked to Tommy of Isaiah's vision and the call of Saul of Tarsus. When Tommy felt the force of his pastor's reasoning, he promised to take the preliminary steps.

He stood the testing. His trial sermon was warmly appreciated by the elders of the church. They commended him to God with earnest prayer and thankful hearts. Tommy then went home and told his mother of all that had happened. There is joy, we are told, in heaven over the return of the penitents; but who shall describe the joy of a godly, hardworking mother, who sees her prayers and sacrifices rewarded with a son, honored by the Church with a call to the ministry! Tears and praises mingled with each other.

"Don't break your heart, mother. I want you to back me up in some little mission parsonage. There, there; dry your tears, mother. I see the minister coming."

Sure enough, up came the minister.

"Pardon me for my selfishness," he said kindly, "but I wanted to have my heart warmed by the recollection of how I've been so disappointed in Gerald St. Clair. I wrested him for the ministry, but he has gone completely into the world. Still God has wonderfully led us and saved us, in spite of ourselves. We have not treated you at all kindly, but he has kept you faithful, and now he has blessed us and blessed Tommy, for it is a great honor to be called to the ministry."

"It has nearly broken my heart," said the good mother, "but it was the prayer of his dear dead father to have a son to stand before the Lord, and now his prayer is answered."

Her tears burst out afresh. Tommy and the minister wept also.

"But, mother," protested Tommy, "you never told me about father praying that I should be a minister."

"How dare I?" said she amidst her tears. "What hope had I to give you a proper education, I, who had to wash and scrub to get a bite for our mouths and a portion for the Lord?"

"'A portion for the Lord!'" exclaimed the minister.

"Yes, sir," said the mother.

"Mother would never go to church without something. She believed in that part which says, 'Thou shalt not present thyself empty before the Lord.' It meant hard work to save a ten-cent bit, but mother always did it."

"Ah, I see it all now. That is the secret. Prayer and sacrifice, the fruits of the Spirit so dear to the God of heaven, were presented every Sabbath day and planned for all the week."

The minister carried and rejoiced with his happy parishioners and then returned to his study. He opened his Bible at the Lord's Sermon on the Mount. "Blessed Spirit," he prayed, "be with me. I am so slow to learn. Even the first word of Christ is only now breaking upon me, the beatitude that says, 'Blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'"

The Prudential's New Method

ANYTHING that relates to an organization which affects over 7,000,000 of our country's population is of interest to the whole. When the Prudential Insurance Company changed to a non-participating basis, ex U. S. Senator John F. Dryden, President of the Prudential, was asked concerning the new departure. He said:

"The Prudential has changed because it believes that the man who buys life insurance to-day wants a policy at the lowest possible cost, with the best protection that money will purchase. The general public now prefers low life insurance rates with liberal guarantees, rather than higher rates with estimated dividends. We believe our new non-participating policy meets these requirements, and that it will be found equal to if not better than any other policy now offered to the public. Everything in the policy is guaranteed."

Mr. Dryden further stated that the company year by year had maintained various economies which had substantially reduced the expense rate, making the company the most economical in the world, as measured by insurance standards. Any one desiring full information as to the new departure may address (sending age and occupation) The Prudential, Newark, N. J.

Palestine as It Really Is*

PALESTINE Through the Eyes of a Native is the title of a most interesting volume by Gamahliel Wadel-Ward, which for many reasons will repay a reading. Writing from the standpoint of an educated son of the Orient, the author points out in a pleasing and good-natured way that is sufficiently convincing, many of the errors into which foreign writers have fallen in dealing with the Holy Land and its people in their books. He also indicates some notable blunders in translations of the sacred Oriental writings which mar and obscure the true meaning.

We give below a few of these instances of mistranslation:

"His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk"; in the original it reads, "His eyes sparkling as wine, and teeth white as milk" (Gen. 49: 12).

"Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land" (Isa. 1: 18, 19). In this statement we find no reasoning whatever; it reads like an unconditional promise of blessings. "Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord; if your sins be as scarlet, can they be as snow? if as crimson, can they be as wool? But if ye return from your wickedness, ye shall eat the good of the land."

We find the old version of the Lord's Prayer, as taught directly by our Lord in the language he spoke, in the Nestorian churches of Chaldea, as follows: "Our Father who art in heaven, we hallow thy name that thy kingdom may come, and that thy will may be done here on earth, as it is in heaven; give us day after day our sufficient necessities, and forgive us our iniquities, as we also should forgive those who sin against us; leading us out of temptation, and delivering us from the evil one: for thou hast the power, the kingdoms and all glory being thine, forever and eternally. Amen." One sentence in this prayer, as rendered in the translation made by the early Christian fathers, and repeated in every church of all denominations, in every language of the civilized world, has been used under protest by many, and that rightfully. I refer to the sentence, "Lead us not into temptation."

Abraham knew Jesus Christ, our Saviour, personally we must believe, when he was met by Melchisedek on the same spot where he was commanded of God to make the sacrifice of his son to him. Of him we read that he was "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually" (Heb. 7: 3). The name Melchisedek means King of Righteousness; his station of honor was King of Peace; he held the highest sacerdotal office, Priest of the Most High, and there is no man in creation whether past or present, but Jesus Christ alone, who could have been called and known as the King of Righteousness and King of Peace, and he corroborates this: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad" (John 8: 56).

Undoubtedly Job suffered from the wormy leprosy, and scraped out the swarming and writhing worms, which when dropped are killed at once. The exclamation made by Job, in the original we read in a correct way, "for I know that my vindicator liveth, and shall stand at last near me upon the earth, and though under my skin worms are destroying this body, yet in my flesh I shall worship God" (Job 19: 25, 26). The poor man was speaking of his present infirmity, and had no allusion to the resurrection whatever.

Devotees in worship were called prophets, and sometimes as if blind to all their surroundings they acted like insane persons, as did Saul. "And he stripped off his clothes also, and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and laid down naked all that day and all that night. Wherefore they say, Is Saul among the prophets?" (I. Sam. 19: 24). These teachers or prophets were, in the days of St. Paul, accepted, as seen by the Christians of the day (Acts 13: 1). Their office as prophet was as they ministered to the Lord and fasted. "And Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them" (Acts 15: 32).

The priesthood was divided into two branches: the first, the priesthood after the order of Melchisedek, the other commencing with Aaron. Our Saviour, undoubtedly the Melchisedek who appeared to Abraham, again visited this earth to prove the laws and the prophesies that foretold his coming as a sacred oblation, and that he had two distinct descents; on one side royal, on the other priestly, namely, that priesthood which went back of Aaron and commenced with God himself. Any one ignorant of the genealogies recorded in the Bible, would look upon this as a serious discrepancy. We will take a glance at the genealogy, that seems so contradictory in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, both tracing our Lord from Joseph to David. Now as it could scarcely be possible that Joseph could have been the son of David from two distinct branches, one would think that either one or both must be mistaken; but here again I have to mention a fact that appeared in one of the preceding chapters, that a woman is nameless in secular as well as in religious courts of the land. She is known and must be known through her husband, so that in giving the genealogy of the wife, they take his name instead of hers, in order to make it legal. Tracing the genealogy given by Matthew we clearly find that our Lord was a direct descendant of David, through King Solomon. This genealogy in Matthew refers to the Virgin Mary, the mother of our Lord, and is her family tree, whilst Luke gets hold of the family tree or genealogy of Joseph and traces him to David, but not through Solomon.

The Valley of Peace

THERE'S a beautiful valley of peace,
Where the heart of the weary may rest;
Where tumult of trials may cease,
And those who are burdened be blest.

CHORUS:

In the valley of peace, the valley of peace,
In the beautiful valley of peace,
My Saviour is there every burden to bear,
In the beautiful valley of peace.

In that beautiful valley, I know
Wild clamor is hushed into calm;
And, walking where still waters flow,
The sorrowing soul findeth balm.

In the valley of peace I may hide,
Where strifes of the world cannot mar,
And there I will follow my Guide,
My hope and my glorious star.

In the valley of peace let me roam
With Jesus, my "Staff" and my "Rod,"
Till I come to my heavenly home
Whose builder and maker is God.

The woman who does her own work ought to have the very best of everything to do it with.

Take this matter of dish washing, for example—the best soap for that purpose is Ivory.

It costs more than ordinary laundry soaps do. It is worth more.

Ordinary laundry soaps make the hands red and coarse and hard—a source of never-ending humiliation.

Ivory Soap adds to their beauty; keeps them sweet and soft and dainty.

For that reason, it is true economy to use it—even if it does cost two or three cents a week more.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

The Christian's Refuge

By Mrs. M. Baxter

GOD spoke to Moses "in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho," that he should command the children of Israel to give cities for the Levites to dwell in, with suburbs for their cattle and their goods, and all their beasts, measuring from the wall outwards a thousand cubits. The Lord was the portion of the Levites; they had no earthly inheritance (Deut. 10: 9), God was the trustee of their property; and when he made provision for those who had no portion on earth, he looked after their cattle too.

God ordained that, among the cities which should be given to the Levites, there should be six cities of refuge for the man who had slain anyone unawares. Thus the Lord became the trustee of the manslayer as well as of the consecrated Levites, and gave him his place among them. In his loving provision for the manslayer, no provision is made for the murderer. If any man had shed blood and taken life, however unintentionally and innocently, there was no safety for him anywhere but on the Lord's ground; in the city of refuge.

Oh, how few of us can say with Paul, "I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God" (Acts 20: 26, 27). Which of us has not unintentionally helped on the destruction of a soul? "When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way to save his life, the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand" (Ezek. 3: 18). Oh, how many of us have shrunk from being faithful, and if God dealt with us according to our works the blood of these souls would be required at our hands! Again, how many earnest seekers after God, when they have looked to our lives for a manifestation of Christ which would convince them of the truth of Christianity, have been thrown back into scepticism, indifference, or superstition, by seeing in us envy, selfishness, unkindness, want of candor, discontent, unbelief in God's promises: manslayers many of us are, though we may not be intentional murderers of souls.

Satan tries hard to keep us blind to this thing, and to make us believe that the salvation of souls is not our business; but when the light of God shines upon us so clearly that we cannot but see how fearful is our guilt, then Satan turns round and sets God's holy law, "the avenger of blood," upon our track, that he may drive us to despair. What is at once our safety, and also the means of correcting our passive, unintentional injury of others? Just this to take refuge in God, under the precious blood, to know ourselves hid with Christ in God (Col. 3: 3); to let others find us there. It was a distinct stipulation that the slayer who had fled to the city of refuge should abide there "unto the death of the high priest." No business, however pressing, might call him away; no family matter, although it were the death of the nearest and dearest; nothing could be an excuse for finding him outside of God's provision for him. He must know no life, no possession, no relative outside; all his interest must be within the city of his refuge, until the death of the anointed high priest; then, and only then, might he return to the land of his possession. Thank God, our High Priest can never die; he continueth ever.

Have you left all, as the slayer did when he fled to the city of his refuge? Is the world left behind? Are your plans for life, your earthly hopes, your self-made provisions left behind?

Acquainted With God*

AMONG the friends who came to condole with Job in his affliction, Eliphaz alone had the spirituality which might have solved the problem, if he had not been blinded by early prejudices. He speaks from personal experience, while Bildad draws his arguments from tradition, and Zophar is a blunt, coarse man, who prides himself on his candor. All had reached the conclusion that the calamities that had befallen Job were punishments. They had probably talked the matter over on the journey, and had come to an agreement. They would do this all the more easily because the idea of associating misfortune with sin was general throughout the world, and, in spite of this book, is not extinct at this day. Eliphaz was not driven from his position by Job's defense of himself; but he weakened so far as to express the opinion that Job might be mistaken in his attitude through ignorance of the ways of God; so he urges him to "acquaint himself with God," and assures him that the result will be peace.

Eliphaz was mistaken in many things, and mistaken about Job; but this advice was good. For a man in health and prosperity, as for a man in sickness and adversity, there is no better course, no surer gain than this of acquainting himself with God. To learn what God wills; to learn the principles of his government as we see them in history and in his Word, and to put himself in line with those principles, is to have the clue to every blessing. It does not insure temporal prosperity, but it does insure spiritual development. God may see in us faults or defects that need adversity; but the man who acquaints himself with God, is content to accept that from his hands as willingly as he accepts prosperity. In either case he has the peace that comes from knowing that his condition is not the result of chance or caprice, but comes from a Being who loves him, and is, besides, infinitely wise. Such acquaintance is a purifying influence. No man can come near to God, without putting away from him all unrighteousness. Eliphaz had an unkind, uncharitable meaning in his words; but as a principle they are true. Not that the sinner is excluded from God's presence; but he must break altogether with his sin; must resolutely put it away from him, and God recognizing his resolve receives him as righteous through Christ.

A Musical Opportunity

THE many letters which reach The Christian Herald, referring to the musical compositions which appear in its pages, show that the love of music is in many hearts. To enable those who have never enjoyed a musical training and others who have some musical knowledge to learn sight-singing, The Christian Herald arranged last year to have a course prepared for its readers. This course, enlarged, is to be repeated this season.

Some of the writers ask: "What do you mean by sight-singing?" Madame Newman, the conductor of the course, replies: "Sight-reading means the ability to read the melody, that is, the notes of a song, as readily as you read the words that are in the text. You read them mentally and hear them mentally, or you may sing them aloud, if you will. While you are reading this announcement, mentally you hear the sound of every word in it. In the same way, you learn to read music and learn mentally to hear the sound of each note. When you have accomplished this, it is no more difficult to sing it out loud than it is to read aloud."

This is what the Sight-Singing Course is designed to teach. The cost of the course is nominal. A thousand pupils were taught successfully by Madame Newman's method a year ago. Hundreds are being enrolled for the present course, the first class of which will begin work shortly. Any reader of this journal who may send in his or her name to "Musical Department, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York," will be assigned to one of the classes.

HELP FOR THE WORKING GIRL

LONG needed and eagerly sought, is the institution soon to be opened in New York by Rev. H. M. Tyndall, Pastor of the People's Tabernacle in East One-hundred-and-second Street. It is a hotel or boarding house for women, which in that district of the city is sure to be speedily occupied. In the stores and offices in the surrounding streets large numbers of young women are employed, must obtain board and lodging in New York. Any one who has sought a suitable home for a girl, which shall be clean, decent, and within her means, knows how scarce such accommodation is. The matrons of rescue homes tell deplorable stories that have been told them by girls who have hired rooms in houses where they were led to take the first steps on the road to ruin. The girl who earns only four or five dollars a week must have a low-priced room, and only too frequently finds it in evil surroundings.

The Non-Sectarian Home and Chapel

Mr. Tyndall, thinking over these facts, which were forced on his notice in the course of his evangelistic work, resolved to make a tentative effort to solve the problem.

It was too vast for him to grapple with, but he thought that if his experiment was a success—which it must surely be—it would encourage some church workers or evangelists to make an effort on a more adequate scale. His first step was to offer for rent a spare room in his Missionaries' Home. It was quickly hired for $1.50 a week by a young student in a Teachers' College, whose thankfulness at finding such a refuge convinced him of the urgent need for further effort. His next venture was the new building adjoining the People's Tabernacle which is shortly to be opened. It will accommodate about one hundred girls. The rooms are large and airy, and there are two pleasant parlors and a dining room on the ground floor. Mr. Tyndall has not forgotten the prime necessity of cheapness. He has decided to rent the rooms for five dollars a week, or if two girls share a room, he will charge them only three dollars each. These, with all the conveniences of a hotel, and with careful supervision of moral surroundings, will make the institution a valuable addition to the philanthropic agencies of the city. At present there is a halt in the arrangements for the opening, as the rooms are not all furnished. This may be easily overcome by any philanthropic friend of the working girl who will assist Mr. Tyndall by providing him with the funds required for the purchase of furniture.

A GREAT WORLD-HISTORY

EVERY passing season witnesses the increasing popularity of Ridpath's History of the World. Readers of this journal who have been so fortunate as to secure sets of these beautiful volumes—there are nine in all—have found them equal in many respects to a complete library. The History is planned in a manner that carries the reader along by easy stages from the earliest ages of the human race down to our own times.

It is written from the standpoint of modern American scholarship, and is wholly free from bias and prejudice. No other work of a historic character is so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. It brings before us in attractive review the story of Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia, the "golden age" of Greece, Rome and Carthage. We follow the strange fortunes of the Hebrews from the patriarchs to the dispersion. We are spectators at the conquests of Cyrus, Alexander, Hannibal, Scipio and Cæsar. We study science with Galileo and Kepler. We share the triumphs of all the great explorers and discoverers, and we become familiar with the lives and characters of the famous men of all times.

To Americans, perhaps, the most instructive and illuminating part of this great work is that which deals with the history of our own Republic. From Washington's time to the present day it is a complete, comprehensive, chronological narrative, which brings the reader down to the events of the present decade. Nothing important, interesting or entertaining is omitted. The literary style of the whole work is of a very high character.

These nine large, well-bound volumes will make an excellent foundation for a family library. As an educator of the young and a mine of valuable information for readers of all ages they cannot be equaled. Many fine illustrations add to the interest, and the maps and charts are a valuable feature. The History of the World is published by the Western Newspaper Association, No. 204 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

Called Higher

William H. Cooper, who died at Floral City, Fla., lately, was an admirable Christian and passed away in the full faith of a blessed future. His life was filled with kindness and marked by many noble deeds.

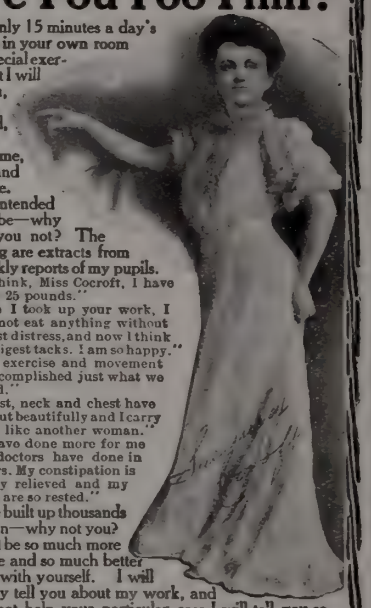
Mrs. P. C. Allen, an old and faithful subscriber of this journal, died June 28 in Hallettsville, Tex., in the sixty-ninth year of her age. She was an earnest Christian and had been affiliated with the Baptist denomination for many years.

On September 15, Mrs. E. H. Drew, for many years a reader of this journal, entered into rest. She was eighty-one years old, a consistent Christian, and a member of the Twelfth Street Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., for more than forty years.

Miss Julia Austin, an aged Christian of Tompkins Cove, N. Y., died recently. For over fifty years she had been a member of the M. E. Church, and she was a devoted reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She was greatly mourned by many friends who appreciated her fine Christian character.

Williams Dickinson, aged seventy-three, passed away at West Northfield, Mass., August 15. He was one of its oldest and most esteemed citizens. In early life he became a member of the Congregational church at Northfield, and did much to help it. He was also an active temperance worker. His greatest desire seemed to be to let no day pass without trying to lead some one to a better life, and the young men employed by him were ever influenced for good by his consistent life and precepts.

Are You Too Thin?



For only 15 minutes a day's practice in your own room upon special exercises that I will give you, you can be round, plump, wholesome, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be—why should you not? The following are extracts from the weekly reports of my pupils.

"Just think, Miss Cocroft, I have gained 25 pounds."

"Before I took up your work, I could not eat anything without greatest distress, and now I think I can digest tacks. I am so happy."

"Every exercise and movement has accomplished just what we wanted."

"My bust, neck and chest have filled out beautifully and I carry myself like another woman."

"You have done more for me than doctors have done in 20 years. My constipation is entirely relieved and my nerves are so rested."

I have built up thousands of women—why not you? You will be so much more attractive and so much better satisfied with yourself. I will cheerfully tell you about my work, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so. My information and advice are entirely free.

I Can Reduce Your Flesh

Would you like to reduce it by natural means and in a dignified manner?

I have reduced 7,000 women in the past 3 years by a series of simple exercises practiced in the privacy of their own rooms and by use of merely a rational diet which will not weaken.

I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen the stomach, heart and relieve you of such chronic ailments as rheumatism, constipation, weak nerves and such difficulties as depend upon good circulation, strong nerves, strong muscles, good blood, correct breathing.

You can be as good a figure as any woman of your acquaintance—no drugs, no medicine.

"I have reduced 81 pounds under your instruction. There is not a wrinkle in my face and my husband says I look like the girl he married. You can imagine how happy I am."

"You have simply saved my life, Miss Cocroft. I was a nervous wreck when I began my work with you."

"I have reduced 65 pounds in five lessons. I have only 10 more pounds to reduce to reach your goal."

He Saw Napoleon's Retreat

BARNET WOLNISKY, a white-haired and venerable-looking Jewish rabbi, now in New York, has a singular history. He was born in Grodno, Russian Poland, 105 years ago. Despite his great age, he is healthy and active. He drinks no water and no liquor, but takes tea frequently, without milk, and eats but one meal a day, of soup, bread and a little meat. He is a fine Talmudist, and speaks seven languages. Rabbi Wolnisky has a keen memory and recalls events that happened nearly a century ago. He remembers well the tragic close of Napoleon's Russian crusade ninety-five years ago, and he watched the broken and dispirited French legions making their way westward through the snows. The rabbi was once wealthy, but is now comparatively poor, though comfortable. He has been twice married. His first wife bore him twelve children and his second fifteen, and he has ninety-two living descendants, every one of whom he knows by name, and he can tell the dates of their birth. He has never been sick, and the only time he was confined to his bed was when he was accidentally run over by a street wagon and slightly hurt. For many years he was rabbi of the synagogue on Eldridge Street, retiring from the office only two years ago.

Barnet Wolnisky

According to Works *

ERRORS are sometimes made by persons attending revival meetings as to the nature of conversion. Evangelists often omit to place sufficient emphasis on the change of life involved. A man may be willing to accept Christ as a Saviour, while being unprepared to accept him as a King. The two offices go together, and, as James insists, faith must be accompanied by works. It is faith that brings salvation; but the saved man must live according to the Gospel, holding Christ supreme over his life. He will be sure to do this if his faith is genuine. He will love Christ, and loving him, will obey him. It is in this that the quality of faith is shown. The mere intellectual faith which believes that Christ came into the world, and that he is able and willing to save, is vain if it is not followed by an earnest desire to fulfil his will in all things.

Failure to apprehend this fact and act upon it has done infinite harm to the Christian Church, and has brought serious reproach upon it. People of the world say of the inconsistent Christian, that his life shows that religion has no power. Thus true religion, of which he is destitute, suffers through his conduct. A son might profess intense love for his father; but if he continually disobeyed him and did the things that the father hated, no one would believe him. They would say that actions speak louder than words. So Christ says, "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." He receives the worst sinners; but they must not continue sinners. He receives them that he may make them righteous.

Religious Liberty in Peru

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Friends of Peru earnestly petition that you kindly allow us to draw the attention of your readers to the fact that July 28 ("Independence Day" in Peru) is being set apart by missionaries in Peru and friends in the United States, Canada and Great Britain, as a day for prayer and supplication on behalf of religious liberty in that republic.

It is not generally known that Peru is the last country in South America to throw open its doors to Protestant missionary enterprise. Article IV. of the country's political constitution declares that Roman Catholicism is the religion of the State, and that the State protects it, to the exclusion of the public exercise of any other. The democratic spirit which revolted against the yoke of Spain and overthrew the Inquisition at Lima has never been able to throw off the religious bondage of Romanism and breathe the free air of religious liberty. The restriction and persecution against Protestantism in Peru are worthy of the Middle Ages, and prove Romanism to be the same relentless foe of human liberty and intellectual freedom.

To-day, Spanish evangelistic services are being held behind closed doors and with no outward indication that the building is a place of worship. Bible colporteurs have been imprisoned, persecuted, mobbed and well-nigh done to death by fanatical Catholics, for no other offense than that of the circulation of the Holy Scriptures. Yet a spirit of heroism is shown by these men. Last year, a native Evangelical Church of Lima, meeting in Vegeieros Hall, provided five colporteurs for the B.F.B.S., who circulated over 12,000 Scriptures across an area of over 2,000 miles on the great elevations of the Cordilleras of the Andes.

SENSE ABOUT FOOD

Facts About Food Worth Knowing

It is a serious question sometimes to know just what to eat when a person's stomach is out of order and most foods cause trouble.

Grape-Nuts food can be taken at any time with the certainty that it will digest. Actual experience of people is valuable to anyone interested in foods.

A Terre Haute woman writes: "I had suffered with indigestion for about four years, ever since an attack of typhoid fever, and at times could eat nothing but the very lightest food, and then suffer such agony with my stomach I would wish I never had to eat anything. I was urged to try Grape-Nuts and since using it I do not have to starve myself any more, but I can eat it at any time and feel nourished and satisfied, dyspepsia is a thing of the past, and I am now now strong and well.

"My husband also had an experience with Grape-Nuts. He was very weak and sickly in the spring. Could not attend to his work. He was put under the doctor's care, but medicine did not seem to do him any good until he began to leave off ordinary food and use Grape-Nuts. It was positively surprising to see the change in him. He grew better right off, and naturally he has none but words of praise for Grape-Nuts.

"Our boy thinks he cannot eat a meal without Grape-Nuts, and he learns so fast at school that his teacher and other scholars comment on it. I am satisfied that it is because of the great nourishing elements in Grape-Nuts." "There's a reason."

It contains the phosphate of potash from wheat and barley, which combines with albumen to make the gray matter to daily refill the brain and nerve centres.

It is a pity that people do not know what to feed their children. There are many mothers who give their youngsters almost any kind of food and when they become sick begin to pour the medicine down them. The real way is to stick to proper food and be healthy and get along without medicine and expense.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD says:

No other work of its kind has ever supplied a history so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men.

We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world's histories to our readers.

THE BOSTON POST says:

John Clark Ridpath is above all things an historian. His historical works are accepted as standard in schools and colleges as well as in business houses and homes. His style is simple and his manner charming.

THE Publishers Failure

BISHOP NEWMAN says:

In reading Ridpath I experience the pleasure realized when looking at some grand panorama. The superb pictures of temples, palaces, scenes, events and men add a charm to the clear and vigorous style of the learned author.

PROFESSOR WARREN,

I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the U. S., and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence.

RIDPATH'S is generally admitted to be the greatest history ever written. It is not so exhaustive that you are discouraged with the task of reading the work, yet is complete and wonderfully interesting. The history of Rome occupies an entire volume; it is a masterpiece. You will be surprised to learn how much of Roman History finds its counterpart in the history being made to-day. The thoughtful mind can detect to-day the same fires of class prejudice fanned by unseen hands, which culminated in the downfall of the Roman Republic and resulted in the establishment of the Empire. Ridpath's analysis of the causes which led to the French Revolution should be read by every citizen who loves his country. His history of the tremendous struggle of our own Civil War is an absolutely impartial account of that momentous struggle, the work being endorsed cordially by the leading men on both sides. Ridpath develops the fact clearly that there is but one thing that will protect the life of any nation, and that is the intelligence and character of the people; that the power of a nation lies not in its wealth or prosperity, not in its armies or navies, but in the intelligence and righteousness to be found in the home life and heart life of its people.

DR. RIDPATH SAYS: "The man or woman who knows nothing of the past is excluded from the best inheritance of mankind. Such an one must be content to live with little influence among his fellows and to meet the Great without a look of recognition."

RIDPATH VOL. IX.
THE CLOSE OF THE NINETEENTH AND DAWN OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

9 massive royal octavo volumes, encyclopedia size, 11 in. tall, 8 in. wide. Set boxed weighs 50 lbs., 4,000 double-column pages, 2,000 superb illustrations

RIDPATH'S enviable position as an historian is due to his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman Senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can walk with Luther, who did more than any other man to give to the world religious freedom. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest human of all time; the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men and events is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic, troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written by man.

RIDPATH throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there; patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles with three hundred and fifty Greek ships smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there, gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says, "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another Century, the most colossal world-figure of his time.

Heart Throbs: A Book Compiled by 50,000 People

HEART THROBS is a collection of scraps in prose and verse—the pathetic or humorous little things that have appealed to people as they sat at the fireside reading newspaper, book or magazine. It is the most notable book of the times. President Roosevelt furnished his favorite selection. Admiral Dewey (the hero of Manila Bay), United States Senator Allison, Speaker Cannon, the late Secretary Hay, together with hundreds of other prominent public men, are numbered among the 50,000 people who contributed material to this unique volume. Its chief value, perhaps, lies in the insight it affords into the tastes and aims of this great army of contributors—"the plain people of America," as Lincoln loved to call us.

Many of the selections were yellow with age, taken from mother's scrap-book, sacred with hallowed memories; some came from between the leaves of the family Bible or the old school-book in the attic; many clippings were worn threadbare and carefully repaired and strengthened; odorous with lavender, rose and orris; stained with tears, printed on silk or deftly limned and illuminated—the heart treasure-trove of American homes, proving that the American people hold dear the sterling virtues of manhood and the sweet, tender sentiments associated with home and mother.

NOTE.—The excerpts on this page were selected from the book "Heart Throbs," by the editor of the London (Eng.) "Daily Mail," and republished with a compliment to the American ideals indicated in these selections.

McKinley's Dying Prayer

"In the afternoon of his last day on earth the President began to realize that his life was slipping away, and that the efforts of science could not save him. He asked Dr. Rixey to bring the surgeons in. One by one the surgeons entered and approached the bedside. When they were gathered about him the President opened his eyes and said:

"'It is useless, gentlemen; I think we ought to have prayer.'

"The dying man crossed his hands on his breast and half closed his eyes. There was a beautiful smile on his countenance. The surgeons bowed their heads. Tears streamed from the eyes of the white-clad nurses on either side of the bed. The yellow radiance of the sun shone softly in the room.

The Late Wm. McKinley

"'Our Father, which art in heaven,' said the President, in a clear, steady voice.

"The lips of the surgeons moved.

"'Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done——'

"The sobbing of a nurse disturbed the still air. The President opened his eyes and closed them again.

"'Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.'

"A long sigh. The sands of life were running swiftly. The sunlight died out, and raindrops dashed against the windows.

"'Give us this day our daily bread; and forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors; and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.'

"Another silence. The surgeons looked at the dying face and the friendly lips.

"'For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.'

"'Amen,' whispered the surgeons."

—James Creelman, in "On the Great Highway."

Description of Christ.

The following epistle is said to have been taken by Napoleon from the records of Rome. It was written at the time and on the spot where Jesus commenced his ministry, by Publius Lentulus, Governor of Judea, to the senate of Rome.

"Conscript Fathers: In these our days appeared a man named Jesus Christ, who is yet living among us, and of the Gentiles is accepted as a prophet of great truth; but his own disciples call him the son of God. He hath raised the dead and cured all manner of diseases. He is a man of stature somewhat tall and comely, with a ruddy countenance, such as the beholder may both love and fear. His hair is the color of a filbert when fully ripe, plain to his ear, whence downward it is more of orient color, curling and waving on his shoulders; in the middle of his head is a seam of long hair after the manner of the Nazarites. His forehead is plain and delicate; the face without spot or wrinkle, beautiful with a comely red; his nose and mouth are exactly formed; his beard is the color of his hair and thick; not of any length, but forked.

"In reproving he is terrible; admonishing, courteous; in speaking, very modest and wise: in proportion of body, well-shaped. None have seen him laugh, many have seen him weep. A man for his surpassing beauty excelling the children of men."

In a Lighter Vein

I have heard of poor and sad congregations, but the saddest preacher I ever knew went from Posey County, Indiana, to Pike County, Missouri, where John Hay discovered Little Breeches and Jim Bludsoe. He was starving to death on donations of catfish, 'possum, and a hundred-dollar salary. Finally he made up his mind to go away. With wet eyes he stood up in the prayer meeting to bid good-bye to his weeping congregation.

"Brothers and sisters," he said, wiping his eyes on his red bandana handkerchief, "I've called you together to-night to say farewell. The Lord has called me to another place. I don't think the Lord loves this people much, for none of you seem to die. He doesn't seem to want you. And you don't seem to love each other, for I've never married any of you. And I don't think you love me, for you don't pay me my salary—and your donations are mouldy fruit and wormy apples. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.'

"And now brothers and sisters, I am going to a better place. I've been appointed chaplain to the penitentiary at Joliet. 'Where I go ye cannot come; but I go to prepare a place for you.'"

A Bit of Newspaper Verse

She took up one of the magazines and glanced through it casually, but somehow it did not appeal to the old lady, and so she laid it down again. There was a volume of poems richly bound in vellum on the table by her side, and for a little while the story of its gallant knights and lovely maidens bewitched her. But soon the weight of the book began to tire her feeble hands.

After that, quite as a last resort, she took up the evening paper and glanced through it just to while away the time. She had never taken much concern in politics, the latest Parisian fashion did not interest her in the least, but presently three little verses wedged in between a lurid account of a murder and a patent medicine advertisement caught her eye.

The poem was Eugene Field's "Little Boy Blue," and at the very first lines of it the old lady became all attention:

The little toy dog is covered with dust,
But sturdy and staunch it stands,
And the little tin soldier is covered with rust,
And his musket moulds in his hands.

Very slowly, as she read on, the tears came into her eyes and dimmed the spectacles so that she could scarcely see the lines of the second verse:

"Now don't you go till I come," he said,
"And don't you make any noise!"
Then, toddling off to his trundle bed.
He dreamed of his pretty toys.
And as he was dreaming, an angel song
Awakened our little boy.
Oh, the years are many——

Yes, they were many! It was more than half a century ago now. The paper dropped from the old lady's hand, and rustled to the floor. There was no use in trying to read any more, for her thoughts had flown away now to the time when she had had such a Little Boy Blue as that. Since then she had had lots of other children. Even now, as she sat there in the twilight, she could hear the shouts of her grandchildren at play n far away, but little Geordie had been her firs born, and somehow the others were different, ar nobody knew just how but herself. She had daughters to console her in her widowhood, and when her married daughter had died, her children had been left. But with little Geordie it was different. They only knew of him by the little headstone in the graveyard; but to her—why, after reading that little poem, it seemed as though it were only yesterday that he was toddling along beside her, rosy and bright, and full of fun. And he used to say just those things—she remembered.

"Why, mother," said her daughter, as she came in, "you've been crying! What's the matter?

"It was nothing dear," answered the old lad as she wiped her eyes. "I was reading, you know and it upset me a little. It was only a bit newspaper verse."

IN THE LAND OF THE HEATHEN LAOS

ONE of the least known missionary regions is the land of the Laos, the mountain tribes who live in the country between China, Assam, Burma, Siam and Tonquin. They are dependent upon Siam and under its authority. Scattered through the northern provinces of Siam, in almost impenetrable localities, are nearly 3,000,000 Laos, the western tribes being known as the Lao-pung-dam or tattooed people, and the eastern tribes as the Lao-pung-khao or untattooed people. They have a definite history that runs back to the middle of the sixteenth century, when they had an independent kingdom and carried on frequent wars; but many of their cities are now little better than ruined hovels, and socially their condition is very low. As the Laos have no coast-line, their very existence has been practically unknown to the white races until a comparatively recent date.

Although the people are Buddhists, they do not adhere so strictly to the rules of that religion as do the Siamese. Their language is like that of Siam, but with a dialectic difference. They are fond of music, and, except in the mountain districts, are a mild people.

In 1867 the first Christian mission to the Laos was established by the Rev. Mr. McGillivray, a Presbyterian missionary, at Chieng-mai on the Quee-Ping River, 500 miles north of Bangkok. The first convert was Nan Inta, a man of influence, learned in the Buddhist religion. Six other conversions quickly followed. But the path of the missionaries was not a bed of roses. Persecution began after the first year's work, and two converts, Noi Soonya and Nan Chai, were tortured and clubbed to death in 1869. The missionaries were driven out and their convert band scattered. The persecution ended with the death of the king of Chieng-mai, and the missionaries have since that time enjoyed a degree of toleration, which was greatly helped by the proclamation of religious liberty in 1878.

Rev. S. C. Peoples and Mrs. Peoples, whose interesting letters from that remote region have occasionally appeared in these pages, established a mission at Lakawn, seventy-five miles southeast of Chieng-mai, twenty-five years ago. They have founded there a mission hospital, an industrial school for boys, and a mission press. The Laos Mission now has vigorous churches in the provinces of Lapon, Chieng Hai and Chieng San. The Presbyterian Board also has several missions and a considerable force of missionaries, lay workers, physicians and native helpers.

Many of our readers, who have helped these missionaries from time to time, will be interested in the following letter from Mrs. Peoples:

Dear Dr. Klopsch: NAN, via Moulmein.

Twenty-five years ago this fall we came to Laos. Only now has work been begun on the dispensary, so slowly are the needs of our work met. Only because Dr. Peoples has undertaken the care of the government soldiers, in addition to the poor people, is the building now made possible.

Like Buddha in the legend, we are fighting sin and snakes. A five-foot poisonous snake was killed yesterday in the china closet of our mission house.

For a long time we have felt a great burden for the salvation of a numerous tribe of Chinese, who were driven by famine long years ago to settle in our high mountains, all through this north Siam region, and even in connecting villages away up four months' journey into China. Once a year these people come to this city (Nan) to "drink the water of allegiance." Last week they were here. The head man is called p'yah luang (great chief), and with him were sons or relatives. Some time ago I obtained from the Bible Society's agent at Bangkok a large number of portions of Scripture and had them sent to these people. With us they are designated as "Yows." Upon this occasion when they called, I brought out more of the Bible in the Mandarin character, when the p'yah exclaimed, "Oh, have you more books that tell about Chow Fa [Heavenly Father]? We believe in him and pray to him and want to know more about him." How my heart praised the Lord! For ten days we gave them instruction, and promised soon to visit them at their home in Wah, four days north of Nan.

Our regular work is among the Laos-speaking people of the valleys, and this alien tribe is new work for which we have no provision. This week your letter came, enclosing check for twenty dollars, and telling of the loving hearts ready to supply native helpers. Surely God is connecting the need and the supply. I have a good man for this work and will send him off at once, paying his expenses and the cost of books from this timely twenty dollars, and shall hope that his labors may be continued by some one who is interested in bringing souls to Jesus. Soon I hope that there will be two evangelists for the Yow people.

Your second letter with check from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for our work among the Laos was received, and I have sent off the money to pay for Scriptures from the Bible Society agent at Bangkok for these people living all about us in the mountains. They are a most lovable people and we have established a man in this work. His glowing accounts of their eagerness to accept Christ as their Saviour fills our hearts with joy. As soon as the rains are over, we purpose to build a camping-place on the mountain, near the village of the head man, and intend to have a school for the children, hoping that in time they can attend our mission school in Nan.

The Celestial Battlements

TEXT—Rev. 21: 16

"The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal"

A MAN'S visions or idealisms or mental similitudes inevitably take upon themselves the forms and colorings and characters of his physical surroundings. When Pharaoh dreamed his dreams, he did not have rapturous revelations of the coming grandeurs of a Persian capital. He caught no glimpse of the future glories of Athens, Rome, Berlin, London, St. Petersburg or New York. He saw a vision of his own pasture lands, and of his own River Nile, flowing past his palace door. He saw his own cattle and his own wheat fields. His dreams were of familiar scenes. The peculiarity was in what these familiar objects did. The seven lean cattle ate up the seven fat cattle; the seven lean stalks ate up the seven fat stalks. The seven fat cattle represented seven years of plenty; the seven lean represented seven years of want; but all were the same kind of cattle which Pharaoh's herdsmen were then tending upon the royal domains.

The Heavenly Jerusalem

When Joseph, the shepherd's son, dreamed his dreams emblematic of his future greatness, the picture in his vision did not show him the glories of an Egyptian premiership. In all probability, living the simple herdsman's life, he at that time had no conception of what a royal court was like. No, Joseph did not dream of ermine and coronets and thrones. He saw the sun and the moon and the eleven stars making obeisance to him. He saw the sheaves of wheat which his brethren were binding in the fields bow down and worship his sheaf. He saw these astronomical and agricultural similes, because, as a shepherd boy, guarding his flock by night, he had often watched and studied the stars. He saw the sheaves, because as a farmer's boy he had often watched the workmen gathering the harvests, and his own back and arms often had been wearied with binding the sheaves. For on the farm during the harvest time all the men and boys who could carry the scythe were pressed into service. It is a psychological law that when we see visions they may be ridiculous or grotesque, but they generally relate to objects familiar to us in our waking hours.

When St. John, upon the Island of Patmos, caught a glorious vision of the celestial capital, the New Jerusalem, what was more natural for him than to pattern it after the greatest and the most wonderful city his eyes had ever seen? He certainly did not picture heaven as any of the modern cities you and I are accustomed to see. He did not think of the New Jerusalem as built upon sand dunes by a beautiful harbor, as San Francisco is built beside the lapping waters of the Golden Gate of the Pacific. He did not find it among the waving palms and the beautiful flower gardens and the orange-groves, under the shadow of the snow-capped mountains of Grayback and San Bernardino, as is Redlands, the most beautiful city of all California. He imagined the New Jerusalem descending from heaven and alighting on a hill, as the Davidic capital was upon a hill. Then St. John imagines this celestial city surrounded by a great wall. Though this wall was glittering with myriads of precious stones, it was the same kind of a wall that encircled the capital of the Holy Land.

The Wonderful Wall

Let us try to imagine the exterior of the celestial capital which we call heaven, as John saw it in vision. I am going to point out to you some of the chief characteristics of those celestial battlements. At other times we may in fancy, under the apostle's guidance, try to enter those gates and roam over the golden boulevards and examine the architecture of the mansions in the skies; but to-day we are going to limit our travels, and just study the outer walls of heaven. It is a strange spectacle as the inspired artist pictures it. It surpasses in splendor every wall and portal in the most magnificent of European or Asiatic cities. Sometimes, as tourists, I think we pass too quickly the beautiful carved doors of the great cathedrals of Europe, or ignore the mighty walls of Eastern capitals, in order to reach the centres of the cities. Let us not make this mistake in reference to heaven. Let us loiter, at least one Sabbath day, to study the walls which encircle our future celestial habitation. "And the city lieth foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth: and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal."

When St. John saw the New Jerusalem looming up in all its vast proportions, he was impressed with the infinite size of heaven. It was a place so large that it took a reed twelve thousand furlongs to measure its outside walls. Now, when you remember that the furlong is one-eighth of a mile, you will see that a traveler must take a journey of six thousand miles to go around it. In other words, if the walls of this great city were stretched out in a straight line, they would reach nearly twice across the American continent, from San Francisco to New York. They would be more than three times the distance between London and St. Petersburg.

Doctor C. A. Goodhart tells us about the vast size of the apocalyptic vision of St. John when he says, "Babylon was a great city, about three times the size of modern London. Yet, comparing the measurements which Herodotus gives of Babylon with the one St. John gives of the New Jerusalem, we find that the latter would contain ten thousand of the former." Can your mind grasp what Doctor Goodhart means?

"Well," says some one, "do you literally mean that the New Jerusalem which St. John saw had any such dimensions as those? Even if we could conceive of a city so wide and so long, we could not imagine it having a height from base to summit, of fifteen hundred miles." No, you must remember that this was a vision, and as such was symbolical. The twelve gates correspond to the twelve tribes of Israel, and to the twelve apostles. The furlongs and the foundation stones are other sets of twelve. I think the apostle intended us to learn, from the great cube, that the heavenly city was big enough to contain all people, of all nations, of all generations, of all times, who have been and will be cleansed from sin by Christ's atoning blood. I want to show that provision is made for the widest acceptance of the invitation "Whosoever will," and is so big that it will take in every sinner who comes and bows at the foot of the cross, and who says, as did the publican of old, "God be merciful to me a sinner." And "the length and the breadth and the height of it are equal."

Unbounded Accommodation

I was never more impressed with Christ's parable of the banquet hall of heaven than after I had studied this revelation of St. John. The banquet tables are spread. The invited guests have refused to come. Then the master of the house said to his servants, "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city and bring in hither the poor and the maimed and the halt and the blind." And the servants said, "Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room." Of course there is room. There is always room in heaven. Why, heaven is so big that God's messengers of all generations can go into the highways and the hedges and spread broadcast the Gospel invitation everywhere, and yet there will be room. Room in heaven! Room for every one that comes in Christ's name! Room, unlimited room! "Whosoever will, let him come and drink of the water of life." Room in the many mansions of the Father's house. And "the length and the breadth and the height of it are equal."

But there is another fact which ought to impress you about the wall of heaven, and that is—it has twelve swinging gates, and they are all gates of pearl. These gates are divided into four groups. There are three gates in the south wall, three gates for the north wall, three gates for the east wall, three gates for the west wall. What do all these gates stand for? They mean that God has an unlimited number of ways for us to get into heaven. It does not matter what gate we enter by, as long as we come through a gate sprinkled with Christ's blood. And yet there are some people so blinded by sectarian bigotry that they think no soul can get into heaven except through one gate, and that the narrow way of their own church door.

Sectarian Partitions

Some time ago, I was speaking along this line in my prayer-meeting room. When I had finished and thrown open the service for general discussion, a gentleman arose and spoke as follows: "I am a Congregational minister. I am glad to hear your pastor call attention to the fact that the walls of heaven have twelve gates. I am glad that I, as a member of a different Christian denomination, can meet and sing and pray with you to-night. Christ said, 'Other sheep I have which are not of this fold.' There are many churches, many folds, but we all follow the one Divine Shepherd. Once the sectarian walls were built so high that the different churches could not see over them. Then time passed on and they were lowered a little, so that the members of the different churches could throw brick-bats at one another. But, thank God, to-night those walls are lowered so that we can reach over them and grasp each other's hands as Christian brothers."

"Amen!" I said to that. But while my brother minister was talking, I kept asking myself this question: "Have those sectarian walls been lowered so much everywhere that all churches have ceased to throw brick-bats at each other?" I believe not. For when that day comes Lutheran, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, and all who worship Christ in spirit and in truth will clasp hands in Christian love. In that day there will not be five or six different churches fighting each other in one little village of five hundred inhabitants. There are twelve gates to the walls of heaven; and all those gates are of pearl.

Jeweled Foundations

But I want you to study the gorgeousness of those glittering walls of heaven, as well as the twelve gates of pearl. Those walls are not made of common stones, as are the walls of the East. Those stones of the walls of the Eastern cities were not selected for their beauty, but for their strength. We can see from the ruins of the old Chinese walls and of the Roman walls in the northern part of England which were built to keep out the Picts and the Scots, that they were not built of beautiful stones. The stones were lifted out of the quarries and placed there to resist armies and to last for centuries. The walls of heaven are not only strong walls; but they are built out of the most beautiful of precious stones. Wherever you examine them, their brilliant surfaces gleam with myriads of flashing lights. Never did rainbow in the sky have such wonderful mixture of colors as those to be found among the precious stones which are built into the walls of heaven. There in apocalyptic vision St. John saw the jasper, the sapphire, the chalcedony, the emerald, the sardonyx, the sardius, the chrysolite, the beryl, the topaz, the chrysoprase, the jacinth and the amethyst. Oh, the beauty, the exuberance, the infinite variety of the colors of the precious stones of the walls of heaven! Why were those stones set in the walls of the New Jerusalem? To teach us that when an immortal soul passes through one of the gates of pearl, he finds that the wealth of heaven is so inexhaustible that every soul is fully satisfied, and every element of its nature has abundant gratification. From this we understand what the Bible means by "the beauty of holiness."

Supposing we should to-day drive up to one of the great walled-in cities of the East. If the setting sun striking its light upon its walls turned them into a flaming mountain of light, and as we approached those walls we found them a mass of precious stones and the gates of the city of pearl, what would we say? Why, we would exclaim: "At last we have reached a city where wealth does not consist in gold and gems, for here they are of no more account than to be used for the decoration of the walls. The treasures of this city must be spiritual, not material." It is so in heaven. There God will give true treasure, and that in infinite abundance. In heaven, the wealth and the joy and the happiness are so inexhaustible that each inhabitant can have his fill and yet there is an ocean of joy left. Like a great tidal wave, the love and the pardon of God have rolled through the boulevards of the celestial city and overleaped the walls, and left its spray as glittering gems shining a gladsome welcome to all who approach the heavenly capital.

The Broad Highway

But there is another fact about those walls of heaven you must not overlook. The length and the breadth and the height of them are equal. What does St. John mean when he says the height is the same as the length and the width? Does he mean that the walls are as he says, a hundred and forty-four cubits high (a multiple of twelve)? Oh, no. This apocalypse has a figurative interpretation. It means that the walls of heaven are so high that none of the meannesses or contemptibilities, or evil thoughts, or sins of earth can ever overleap them. It means that the walls of heaven are so high that when we once enter into heaven, all the evil desires of our lower natures shall cease and we shall stand before Christ, perfect as he is perfect, pure as he is pure, holy as he is holy. When you pass through those gates of pearl, you will never again be tempted to be selfish; never again be tempted to speak a harsh word against your neighbors; never again be tempted to do what you ought not to do, or to leave undone those things which you ought to do. Then all bitterness, all envy, all hate, all evil desires shall forever pass away. Speed that day, O most merciful Father, when I shall awake in thy glory and my sinful nature shall be cleansed and purified!

But the most blessed thing to me about this text I have not yet dwelt upon. That is the breadth of the walls. We are not told, but I think they are very

DURING his visit to this country, the Rt. Rev. Arthur Foley Winnington-Ingram, Lord Bishop of London, has been an exceedingly active personage. He has visited Washington, been greeted by President Roosevelt and many prominent people there, and has been one of the leading participants in the Episcopal Convention at Richmond, Va. His capacity for speechmaking is apparently unlimited. As a speaker he is equally at home on religious or social topics, and whether in the pulpit, on the platform or as the central figure at some notable public function, his wit, his learning and his effective oratory have won him unstinted admiration and a host of American friends.

He was the principal speaker recently at an open-air meeting in Wall Street, held under the auspices of the Evangelical Committee of New York City. The Rev. William Wilkinson had charge of the services, which are ordinarily of the usual evangelical order. On this occasion there was a gathering of several thousand brokers, clerks and messengers, all of whom listened with deep interest to the Gospel message of the distinguished preacher.

The police stopped carriage traffic in Wall Street on the Custom House block and for that entire block the crowd was closely packed at noon. The broad steps and stone porticos of the old Custom House held a dense crowd, and the steps and hallways leading to many of the banks, insurance offices and brokers' offices were also packed. Windows of all buildings on the block were crowded also.

The Bishop stood on a packing-box, facing the multitude of bulls and bears, clerks and messengers. There were several policemen on duty, but the crowd was orderly and good-natured. Dressed in his customary frock, apron and knee-breeches, the Bishop spoke for some fifteen minutes. His style of address was free and unconstrained, the language simple and effective, and punctuated by smiles and gestures that quickly won confidence. It was a plain, evangelical sermon, full of practical common-sense religion and admirably adapted to the audience and the occasion. He showed the necessity of religion to enable men to bear the stress and burden of business life, to conquer its difficulties, overcome its temptations and reap the highest results from its advantages. Without religion in the heart, even the greatest successes brought no advantage. Wealth should be a servant and not a master. He pointed them to the Gospel as the solvent of all troubles.

The Bishop said the preacher was at a disadvantage, because he had to preach about something that could not be seen. He was often taunted about having no proof to give of the verities he spoke of. It reminded him of an incident in a London park. "We sometimes," he said, "have a fog in London. Well, on that morning there was a fog. A boy was sitting on the grass with a stick in his hand and a string wrapped around it. I asked him what he was doing. 'Flying a kite,' said the youngster. 'I cannot see any kite,' I said, looking up. 'Neither can I,' said the boy, 'but I can feel it pull.' That evidence satisfied the boy that the kite was there. Now I think we have this kind of evidence for the eternal verities. The sailor on shipboard in a storm, the miner in an explosion, and people in all kinds of crises are driven to prayer. That is the 'pulling.' Then there is conscience. Every man has an instinctive knowledge of the difference between right and wrong. That is the 'pulling.' So it is in many experiences of life. There is something within us that we cannot account for, except by the conviction that there is something invisible outside of us that finds a response within."

His strange congregation listened attentively and evidently liked the sermon as well as the preacher. It was a novel and impressive sight to witness that great gathering in New York's financial centre, stopping at mid-day to hear the Gospel and to recite the Apostles' Creed, the assembled thousands repeating the latter in a hoarse murmur and with heads reverently uncovered.

The Bishop of London at a Banquet of Clergymen and Laymen

On the same day, the Bishop of London was the principal figure at two other notable gatherings. The first was a one o'clock luncheon at a Broadway hotel, where he spoke to over a hundred clergymen and laymen. There were several foreign consuls among the guests. In the evening he attended a banquet given in his honor by the Pilgrims of the United States, where he met many men eminent in law, literature and theology, and a number of prominent public officials, federal, State and municipal. Thanking the audience for his gracious welcome, he said:

"I can hardly find words to express my thanks for this perfectly overwhelming welcome. This is the most distinguished audience, I am told, and the most representative I have yet seen, and I've seen a good many such in my short stay in America. I hear your President, Mr. Roosevelt, is fond of telling boasts that he likes to kill things, but I must say he seemed to be the one who kept everybody alive in America. He is over-[illegible] the most interesting man I ever met.

"Now you want to know about your humble servant. I will confess we never prayed [illegible] as the Bishop's code was, as I said, the President looked as pleased as if he had been a man who had [illegible] children. Now you have the truth of it. I must tell Mr. Roosevelt had the tact to make me feel when I left that I had left a personal friend behind.

"I accept this welcome for my country as given to it, for myself, and for London, too, for I agree with you New Yorkers it's the best watering place in the world. But your greeting has a personal note that goes to my heart.

"The ignorant told me I would be immediately [illegible] constantly asked what I thought of your good country. Truly, I have been struck by the [illegible] of Americans in that respect. Therefore I'll answer the [illegible] now. You are already one of the greatest countries on earth. Canada is going to be one, too, and I want you to take interest in her growth. The great thing that strikes me in America is that you receive more than a million foreigners a year and in a generation you stamp them with a real love for the United States. It is really astounding to me how quickly and thoroughly you make them American citizens.

"Another point that is driven home in my mind is that you have a real grip on your slums. It is spiritual, moral, physical. You are ahead of London in this respect.

"Another thing that strikes me most forcibly in America is that all denominations work together. We have had enough interdenominational trouble in England, and we have not settled down yet, as you have, for the good of the common country. But we are making progress. We are improving. No bad play can now live in London a week under the combined opposition of all denominations. I thank you from the bottom of my heart for this ovation."

At the close of his speech he was loudly applauded. Addresses were made by W. Butler Duncan and others.

As a sightseer, the Bishop has probably few equals, for he succeeded in covering the greatest distances and visiting the largest number of places of metropolitan interest in record time, using an automobile. In addition to the three gatherings already mentioned, he visited on the same day the University Settlement on the East Side, and the Mills Hotel, inspecting both pretty thoroughly. Wherever he went his charming manner, his clever speeches, his enlivening conversation and his perennial good humor won instant friends. He evidently enjoys his "American pleasure trip," as he calls it, to the fullest extent, even if he has made it a phenomenally busy one, preaching no less than forty sermons and doing a vast amount of other work of a religious and social character between whiles. It is a long time since New York has had a visitor who so quickly became a popular favorite with all classes.

WIRELESS MESSAGES ACROSS THE OCEAN

INVENTOR Marconi's dream of a wireless system that would be a success commercially came true when, on Thursday, the 17th of this month, over ten thousand words were sent between America and Great Britain. The two stations that were used at the inauguration of this international service were the Glace Bay, in Nova Scotia, and the Clifden, in Ireland. The wonderful success attending the transmission of these messages puts the praticability of Marconi's wireless system beyond all doubt, and a new era has begun in the methods of intercontinental communication.

The dispatching and receiving instruments were busy during the sending hours of the first day with telegrams of congratulation. The first to come shooting through space was from the famous scientist, Privy Councilor Lord Avebury, perhaps better known under his former designation of Sir John Lubbock. The message read:

"I trust that the introduction of the wireless will more closely unite the people of the United States and Great Britain, who seem to form one nation, though under two governments, and whose interests are really identical."

Inventor Marconi Sending Messages by Wireless

Lord Avebury's message was condensed in London to meet the fifty word limit.

Mr. Marconi's triumph comes after a long struggle against great odds. Seven years ago he caused a flutter of interest in scientific circles by declaring that the air could be used to transmit messages as well as the wires and cables now in use. The idea was scouted by prominent electricians, and business men were unwilling to invest money in his scheme.

Gradually his experiments proved that he was right and subscriptions [illegible] forthcoming to build his experimental stations. In 1902 the first message was flashed across the Atlantic Ocean from the Glace Bay station. It was a greeting from President Roosevelt to King Edward. Much, however, [illegible] to perfect the apparatus, so the regular opening of the system was delayed until the present. It will now be possible to send a message by wireless across the Atlantic for [illegible]

HIS PARISH NEAR OLD ARARAT

AFTER an absence of nine years we are here upon our fourth visit home since our departure in 1868. Though rejoicing at first glimpses of persons and things, in this wonderland of such progress as only those long absent from it can fully appreciate, still we can but turn back in thought and imagination to what we have left behind in the Orient, where we have thrown deep our roots of occupancy and sympathy during these thirty-nine years of tenure.

Can we forget that first sixteen years passed in Erzerum, a city of 60,000 inhabitants, where we worked like Trojans in acquiring the Armenian language till we had "ground out" in manuscript our first sermon at the end of six months and delivered it; and how in touring our parish—equal in extent to half of New England—we found ourselves at the foot of old Ararat, and were tempted to indulge our natural desire for mountain climbing and so ascended the sacred old upland? Or how we went through the Russo-Turkish war with its siege, famine and pestilence in 1877 and 1878, that made heavy call upon our little American colony, carrying off four of the seven? We inaugurated relief work to help save poor, suffering humanity, and began it largely as a work of faith, since response to our appeals outside did not take effect till the close siege was upon us from the Russians coming up. When the Russians came into occupancy for over six months, we pushed right up into their own country, in response to repeated requests from old friends, and organized the first evangelical church near Etchmiadzin, north of and near Mount Ararat. We cannot forget these things, nor now, in an opposite direction from Erzerum, down along the old Euphrates and near its western bank, we set going in Erzingan with its 20,000 inhabitants a permanent evangelical work during our two years there, albeit some opposition and annoyance from the old Armenian church people arose. We lived the opposition down, however, and gained friends there. In a word, such was the power of the Gospel and Christian education in the Erzerum field, that in the sixteen years we were there we saw adherents to the cause more than quadrupled, though there was difficulty in getting parents to send their girls to school. Ridiculing the idea that girls should be educated, they said, "Are they to be priests that they should be taught to read?"

But volunteers were sought for Bitlis, 170 miles further south, 350 miles from the Black Sea coast, a city of 35,000 inhabitants, near the west end of Van Lake. The lake is a body of salt water some 75 miles long, and over 5,000 feet above the level of the Black Sea. On we hastened to the new charge, passing through Khanous, near the native-reputed garden of Eden, where we also found the traditional sites of Abel's and Cain's cities, and Nimroud Mountain. Our way led over the very route Xenophon's ten thousand Greeks took in their famous march. We traveled on horseback till we crossed the eastern branch of the Euphrates, and in three days we entered the city that was to be our home, as it proved, for the next twenty-three years.

Bitlis lies in a gorge of the Taurus mountains, but at an elevation of 5,000 feet above the sea. The trend of the mountains round about and the wind currents are such that the heaviest snow falls there, the aggregate from November till April of this last winter being twenty-seven feet plump. Plenty of rain followed, too. But in that Baltimore latitude flowers are often out in the last days of April, and spring comes on quickly, though the last one was later than usual.

It is when the snow is melting, making a mixture of fresh-falling sleet, rain, and slush, that severe earthquakes are most common in that region. This was the case on March 22 and April 1, in our last spring episode when the earthquake occurred for the relief of whose sufferers THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was the first to respond. In our relief work, we issued tickets on the town bakers for bread over our own seal, but when the late Governor, ill-treated by those of his own sect, attempted it with an official seal, it did not fare so well, as they had not confidence that the money would be forthcoming.

Now, some may ask: Why use missionary time in these side issues of relief, in the care of orphans, in training and teaching them trades, and looking after the sick? The people will have it that we too are doctors, and with long experience and our medical books we feel we are following the Master, who went about doing good and healing the sick. By indirect ways, we di arm the prejudices of those who would argue that w are proselyters rather than reformers, for we neve preach "Leave your church!" if you can be conte and grow in grace within its bosom.

In the East, the rule is apt to be "Each sect for i self," while for other sects, it is, "Hands off!" On the dispenser of relief was a guest at a coffee-shop in a important city, and overheard a warm discussion amon Armenians outside. "Who is this person?" w asked. The reply was given, "This is the one who giving out relief to the poor in E. without distinction c race or religion." "Nonsense!" replied the othe "you need not talk that to me!" But when the othe affirmed it as an actuality, it was a slight revelation c humanitarian, not to say Christian principles. The were brought nearer to us in sympathy and interest tha ever before.

Then, again, the taking up hundreds of Armenian o phans after the massacres to house, and train them i the trades and to give them Christian education, was a important pointer in that direction. Though most c the money to support them comes from outside, yet suc Armenians as reach regions where they can earn mone do not forget poor orphans of their race, and often sen their contributions. We are in much need of funds for thi department, not only for food but for the factory, b keeping up which they may be able to earn their ow bread, instead of depending on foreign money for livelihood. We must plead with patrons that they hel them still longer, and, most of all, the young girls.

Three years ago we had occasion to scale once agai those well nigh impassable mountains and visit Sassoun to distribute 230 oxen and 100 plows, with clothing fo the needy; but we consider these orphans and the shap ing of them into hopeful young men and women, educa tionally and spiritually, of far more importance tha relief work, for it has a lasting benefit.

This influx of orphans has given new life to ou work, and has offset somewhat the heavy emigration o the past few years. Since entering the field in 1884 we have seen the large chapel and boys' high schoo built, also new rooms added to the Ely Sisters' Moun Holyoke Seminary for girls—all in the same Protestan compound. Some of our graduates have been throug our colleges, four are pastors, two in the field and tw in American pastorates, while others are teaching an preaching, and some are in business doing fairly well.

In all these years of labor, Mrs. Cole has borne most important part in the campaign. So also has ou daughter. Never could I have held on there as I did had they not been there to help in a hundred differen ways, looking after the orphans, taking charge of m English correspondence, etc. And when we at las gave up in obedience to the doctor's advice and de cided to leave for America, I fear we should not hav been here to-day only for our daughter's helping han in packing us off for the long journey.

A MISSION CHURCH FOR NATIVE AFRICAN MINERS

ABOUT ten miles from Umtali, Africa, is the Penhalonga Valley, where there are some very rich gold mines. A large number of natives are employed in these mines. At present there are about two thousand, representing various tribes: Zulus, Sennas, Blantyres, Mashonas, etc. Until recently, nothing has been done to help them either mentally or spiritually.

A few months ago a new manager came to the mines who is a godly man. Rev. Mr. Wodehouse, of the Umtali Mission, has been able to carry out a long-cherished desire to have the Gospel preached to these "boys." A large church has been built, to hold about eight hundred people. It is what is called a wattle-and-daub building, with a thatched roof. On Saturday night, the day before the opening of the church, Mr. Wodehouse gave a limelight entertainment. The pictures and talk were on the Prodigal Son. Most of the audience had never seen anything of the kind before, and were full of wonder. There were about four hundred natives present at the opening service on Sunday.

A native evangelist has been appointed who will hold regular services, and will soon start a school.

One can easily see what an important work this is, and how far-reaching. As these representatives of dif ferent tribes return to their various homes, they carr with them the Gospel truths they hear, and so th good seed of the kingdom will be scattered in place where it has never reached hitherto, and bring fort spiritual fruit a hundredfold. LOUISE M. WODEHOUSE.

[Rev. Mr. Wodehouse, Mrs Wodehouse, and a party o missionaries under Mr. Wode house's charge have been doing a remarkable work in the Um tali district. Accounts of thei labors have appeared fro time to time in these pages.

THE STORY OF A MISSION CHECK

ALABAMA PLANTATION, MOULMEIN, BURMA.
September 3, 1907.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I have been trying to get around to writing to you ever since I received your kind note enclosing this check for $2.00, last June. By the last home mail came your check for $175.

I believe the donors of that money will see fruit from it to the glory of God in the salvation of souls. It has made a profound impression on the heathen.

From the day I got home, the latter part of July, at family worship and in our Sunday service, the prayer has gone up unceasingly that God would send men and money for this work. Often heathen were present when this request was made.

On Thursday afternoon last a young fellow from Ankai came over and asked to be taken on as a workman, which I was most thankful to do. On Friday noon three men from P'nghat came and asked to be employed. Having prayed the Lord to send men I did not dare to refuse. Providentially—I mean that word in its fullest sense—that morning a man had come with seven pounds of fish to barter for rice, so that there was food in so far, for them; but ng'pu (which the natives regard as an absolutely indispensable adjunct to all their meals), salt, vegetables and chillies were all gone, and not even the fraction of a cent in the house.

I fled to my refuge, prayer, and besought the Lord to send me either the things we needed or the money wherewith to buy them. In two hours came two women with cucumbers, salt, ng'pu and ducks' eggs to barter for cocoanut oil and sugar. The next day (Saturday) I held a regular reception. All day long the people came in twos and threes, each one bringing vegetables, salt, chillies, ng'pu or money for things they wanted to get from me. Never in all the time we have lived here have the people come in such numbers, and never before but once have they brought salt, and never once before have they brought ng'pu. My little matron came running in just bubbling over with joy as one set after another came bringing the very things we were in such sore need of. She could not believe her eyes and ears at first. She had been in the depths of despair when those men came, not seeing how they were to be fed.

Then came your letter and its enclosure. Thaing Kin was standing near when I opened it, and when I exclaimed, "Oh, thank God!" she questioned anxiously: "What is the matter, Ma-ma?"

I showed her the check and told her that God had sent us five hundred and twenty-five rupees. She whirled and ran to the kitchen to tell the glad news. Then I called my own household together and showed them the check.

The matron said, "Thaing Kin told us, but we did not believe her."

We had our morning service soon after. I told the heathen workmen—they all attend family worship and Sunday services—of how we had been praying for men and money, and showed them the check. Then we sang "Loving Kindness," and had the 103d Psalm, and again sang "How Firm a Foundation." It went with a will, all making melody in their hearts to the Lord.

Then I had Loo-Hahu, our young teacher, read the eighteenth chapter of I. Kings. I had chosen that portion, after asking guidance, before the mail came. I told these heathen men that as God gave Israel the token by fire, that he alone was God, just so truly had he given them unmistakable evidence to the same great truth by, in answer to our prayers, sending upon them the desire to come and work here, though no message had gone from us to call them, and we knew nothing of them, and when they did come, he sent me the food for them, and now the money wherewith to pay them. I could see that they all felt awed as they realized that they had been acting under an impulse from God himself, and recognized that it was not a vain thing to call upon the living God.

White Teacher and Native Girls at Miss Haswell's Mission

Callers again on Sunday and Monday, from widely separated localities, have taken the news of the check far and wide. I fully expect to see some through it, "turn from their idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven."

Ask THE CHRISTIAN HERALD donors to join me in prayer for this outcome from their gift.

On May 4 we were visited by a terrible cyclone. It extended over a very wide extent of territory, carrying ruin wherever it went, blowing down houses and trees. It struck the further end of this plantation and swept along its whole uncleared extent, breaking off or tearing up by the roots almost every tree in the expanse till it came to this house and the plantain or banana garden above it. It just seemed as if God held his hand over us. The storm then made a bound to beyond the plantain garden and leveled every tree between it and the upper garden. The boys' house, which was empty, was laid flat on the road in front of where it had stood. The cyclone then bounded clean over the cotton plantation, and went on to regions beyond.

There was a second swirl of the storm, and that broke down our girls' house. The girls had been accustomed to it, but had fled to a place of safety before the house was blown down. The storm did us no damage whatever, beyond the felling of some five houses.

It has felled all our trees on the cultivated land, so that next March I shall only have to have the good timber sawn into posts and boards, and fire-wood cut and stacked, and the whole area burned over to have it ready for planting next May. The cyclone has saved us hundreds of rupees in having that done for us. A thin fringe of trees was left to form a wind break. I felt to praise God indeed for his mercy. Mr. Tomblad was too ill to leave his bed the day of the cyclone. It would have been terrible indeed if this house had suffered. A little it did suffer, the thatch was torn off in two places and the ridge cap lifted so that we were all wet for days, and had discomforts otherwise, but no one took cold, and when the storm subsided sufficiently to permit the men to go up on the roof, everything was quickly put to rights.

On August 20, after worship in the evening, another cyclone struck us. I was writing a letter, two of the children were spreading out their beds, and one gathering up the pictures they had been looking at; the grown-ups had gone to bed. In an instant, in spite of everything being shut as tightly as possible, a whirlwind caught those papers and sent them whirling up to the roof, and in a second the cyclone burst upon us. Bolts were blown off the doors, holes torn in the roof, and in less time than it takes to write it, we were all drenched to the skin. Chairs and boxes and tins went on a wild dance. Mg Bah and I twice over fought with the wind to get the door closed, and finally succeeded, and in a lull of the wind, by putting a case of condensed milk against the shut door, and my exerting all my strength in addition, Mg. Bah helping to hold, too, we managed to get a batten nailed across to hold it, and I got the poor, terrified children across to the kitchen, where they were comparatively safe, and told them to build a good fire in the stove and dry their blankets as well as they could and go to bed.

Then I came back and Mg. Bah helped me move my lounge into the least exposed corner, cover it with oil cloth and weight that down. The second door had burst open and been secured, before the wildest burst of the cyclone came. For fully twenty minutes Mg Bah and I stood and waited. It seemed as if the house must go. It shook and strained in the wind, but though we could see the whole roof lift, and feel the straining, we were kept from further harm. After a time it was evident that the worst was over. By God's mercy none of us took any harm.

I can never tell you how I thank you and your readers for the help sent. May God bless you and them abundantly, both in your own souls and work, and by giving you to see much fruit from this work in the salvation of souls.

BRITISH METHODISTS ARE NOW UNITED

By Rev. George Adams, D.D.

ONE of the most important of recent ecclesiastical events in England is the union of three Methodist denominations, adopting by the authority of an act of Parliament the name "The United Methodist Church." It was the uniting of the Methodist Free Church, founded in 1857; the Methodist New Connexion, founded 1797, and the Bible Christians, founded 1815, with 908 ministers, 2,652 places of worship and 334,621 Sunday School scholars. These separate bodies, always one in doctrine and faith, are now one in government and administration.

By invitation of the pastor, the Rev. Dinsdale T. Young, and the officers of City Road Chapel, London, England, the Conference was held in that historic building, commencing Tuesday, September 17. Seven hundred delegates were present. Rev. W. B. Clark, President of the Bible Christian Church, was temporary chairman. Distinguished representatives of the Wesleyans, the Revs. Charles H. Kelly, Nehemiah Curnock, J. Scott Lidgett and Mr. Henry Holloway, also Rev. H. Youll, President of the Primitive Methodist Conference, Mr. Robertson Nicoll, Revs. J. Baxter, J. W. Walls, J. W. Blackwell, H. Codling, E. D. Cornish and S. B. Lane were invited to the platform. Notable interest was manifested by the different denominations in the movement by the telegrams and letters that were read, including the Bristol and Bath Wesleyan Methodist Synod, the chairman and secretary of the Congregational Union, the clergy and church wardens of St. Philip's and St. James', Oxford, the Irish Church, the Primitive Methodist Church, the President of the Wesleyan Conference and the British and Foreign Sailors' Society.

The address of welcome to City Road Chapel was given by the pastor, Rev. Dinsdale T. Young.

Rev. Edward Boaden, of Leamington, the beloved leader of the United Methodist Free Church, was elected president, and the Rev. G. Packer secretary. The Rev. E. D. Cornish submitted a resolution for the adoption of the deed poll of foundation, which declared the constitution and doctrinal tenets of the united church, and contained provisions for the government of the affairs of the church. This was passed with but one dissentient vote, and signed by the president and the outgoing presidents of the three combining bodies.

A Thanksgiving Fund of one hundred thousand guineas was inaugurated at a mass meeting on Tuesday evening at City Temple.

The most spectacular event of the Conference was on Wednesday morning, when there was in attendance, in robes of office, the Lord Mayor of London, with the sheriffs and officials of the city corporation, also the Lords Mayors from Bristol, Cardiff and Leeds, and about a dozen mayors from provincial towns, and the sheriff of Norwich.

The mass meetings held in City Temple on Wednesday evening in the interest of missions, and on Thursday evening as a Young People's Rally, indicated the desire and purpose of the church concerning world evangelism and the need of consecrated young people to embrace the religious opportunities of the hour.

In reply to a Conference message to the king, the following message from Edward VII. was received:

"I am commanded by the king to ask you to convey to the United Methodist Church, now assembled at its first Conference, the sincere thanks of his majesty for their message of fidelity and loyalty, which the king fully appreciates and values. Dominus."

There can be no doubt as to the salutary effect of this union of Methodist communions among the English people. This union, following the example of Methodists in Canada, New Zealand and Australia, may lead to the consummation of a united Methodism in Great Britain and the United States. The good cheer, lack of friction, and manifest inspiration at the first Conference of the United Methodist Church will lead to gracious results before the holding of its next session in Hanover Chapel, Sheffield, June 9, 1908.

Exit the Peace Congress

AFTER a series of sittings lasting from June 15 to October 18, the Peace Conference at The Hague has adjourned. Although the most important part of its work—the enactment of an International Arbitration Treaty—has been left unfinished, it is in such condition that it can be taken up at the next session of the Conference. Representatives of Great Britain, France and the United States, and several other delegations, constituting a fair proportion of the whole, favored it; but the influence of Russia, Germany and Japan opposed it. Notwithstanding the eloquent advocacy of arbitration by Mr. Choate and his associates, the general plan, while applauded by the Congress, had to be abandoned as impracticable at the present stage of affairs. Its friends and supporters will enter the next Conference with higher hopes and greater encouragement. Knowing the righteousness of their cause, they will not lose heart meanwhile, but will continue to fight until the battle is won.

But the results of the Conference, while disappointing as a whole, are not destitute of some crumbs of comfort for peace-lovers. Among the things accomplished are conventions for the peaceful regulation of international conflicts; providing for an international prize court; regulating the rights and duties of neutrals on land and sea; covering the laying of submarine mines, the bombardment of towns from the sea, the collection of contractual debts, the transformation of merchantmen into warships, the treatment of captured crews, the inviolability of the postal service and the application of the Red Cross to sea warfare. These conventions or agreements will remain open for signature by the representatives of the various governments until June 30, 1908.

This Conference has proved to be merely a skirmish. The real battle for world-wide arbitration has yet to be fought. Meanwhile, "Organization and Education" should be the watchword of the friends of peace here and abroad.

The Chinese Hebrews

MANY attempts have been made to trace the ten tribes of Israel that seceded from Rehoboam, and after a troubled history of two and a half centuries were deported to Assyria by Sargon. A new light is now thrown on the subject by Mr. Oliver Bainbridge, who describes, in the current number of The National Geographic Magazine, a visit to the remnants of a strange people whom he found in the city of Kaifengfu, China. There is no way of explaining the existence of these people except on the theory that some portions of the ten tribes, being granted liberty by the kings of Assyria, wandered into China and there settled. Mr. Bainbridge found in this remote city a group of eight families, numbering in all about fifty persons, wearing Chinese dress and speaking the Chinese language, but professing a religion altogether different from any of the religions of China.

On winning their confidence, he elicited from them some of their traditions. They told him that they were the remains of "a vast community" once living in that region. They showed him a great stone, bearing an inscription, recounting fragments of their history. It stated that their original leader "understood the mysteries of creation" and had left them certain commands. Among others, that they were not to worship any idolatrous representation. He had built for them a "cenoby" or place of worship in the sixteenth year of the Yuen dynasty, which had been destroyed by a flood and was rebuilt two hundred years later, and again destroyed.

Mr. Bainbridge learned from one member of the community that they had once possessed a sacred scroll containing their laws, but it had been rotted by water and was subsequently stolen. The chest in which it had been kept had also been carried away, but had been traced to a Mohammedan mosque.

This was found by the traveler, but the sacred scroll had wholly disappeared. It was evident, however, that the people were Hebrews, and the isolation in which they were living confirmed the belief. They were aware of their racial origin and besought Mr. Bainbridge to make their condition known to rich Jews in Europe and America, in the hope that they would rescue them from the Chinese, who hated and oppressed them.

There can be little doubt that this strange people, whose history in China stretches back for over 2,000 years, are descendants of some Hebrew families belonging to the northern kingdom of Israel. Probably their ancestors never heard of the return in the time of Cyrus, or they may then have been prospering and did not care to join the Jews who went back. It is singular that, having lost their Scriptures and having seen their synagogue destroyed, they should have retained their separate life, distinct from the people around them. It shows the tenacity of their race and the survival of the ancient faith. All their forms and ceremonies are gone; they do not even know why they are separate from other people; but they and their Chinese neighbors are conscious of it—a mute evidence of the eternal divine provision which they have unconsciously fulfilled.

A Miracle of Science

IN this age of scientific progress, we are so accustomed to wonderful things that we cease to marvel at them. Consequently the news that Marconi has at last succeeded in establishing wireless telegraphic communication between the two continents of Europe and America does not impress the average reader with the importance it deserves. Yet it is one of the grandest triumphs of science our day has witnessed. The idea which, only a few years ago, was regarded as visionary and impracticable, is now transformed into reality, and the thing, the mention of which was wont to excite an incredulous smile, is a thing accomplished. Within fifty years after the laying of the first Atlantic cable, we are talking across the three thousand miles of sea without the aid of any cable. Ere another decade be sped, the wireless system may be so far advanced that it will have supplanted not only the old marine cable system, but it may even revolutionize the present method of land communication also.

Apart, however, from the great commercial advantages to accrue from the introduction of wireless telegraphy, there are other international results that must benefit the whole world. Cheaper intercontinental communication will bring a closer union of all human interests and a more cordial appreciation of each nation by the others. It will knit men together not only in the bonds of business, but by the neighborly ties of sympathetic human interest. It will give to the world's peoples a better understanding of each other. M. Clemenceau, premier of the French Republic, expresses this sentiment very clearly in his wireless cablegram, wherein, after sending to America the greetings of her sister republic, he intimates that the new invisible tie will work for "the maintenance of peace and the happiness of the people." In this exalted sense, the latest triumph of science will prove a victory for civilization.

There is an inspiring spiritual suggestion in Marconi's success which cannot be overlooked. To transmit a message by the wireless telegraph, it is essential that the instrument at the sending point should be in perfect attunement with that at the receiving station; the sender must "synchronize" his machine so that its adjustment is accordant with the other in the most minute detail. These harmonious conditions established, the message flies invisibly through the air to its destination, where it is recorded and the response comes unfailingly in the same mysterious manner. So with the prayers of the believing soul. When the heart turns toward God in sincere faith and dependence upon him, the prayer ascends through ways of light,

To the bright Source of all.

Spurgeon once said: "Prayer pulls the rope below, and the great bell rings above in the ear of God." Surely the scientific miracle of the invisible message, sent halfway around the globe by the wireless telegraph and eliciting its answer, should assure us that the great Architect of the universe, who has brought man to such knowledge, hears the petitions of all who appeal to him in simple faith, through prayer, the invisible wireless telegraph between earth and heaven.

The Imported Pastor

IT has become more or less the custom, of late years, to import distinguished talent from abroad, to fill desirable pulpit vacancies in our great cities. This is perhaps as it should be, and no reasonable objection can be urged to such a course, especially when it brings new methods, new ideas and a welcome versatility, which is as refreshing as it is novel.

Some time ago a noted German professor, speaking at a public function in Berlin, remarked that if Germany and the United States, for a time, could exchange teachers on certain lines of higher education, it would be to their mutual advantage. We are not quite sure that it would not be an equally desirable arrangement, by way of occasional variety, for England ar America, once in a while, to do the same thing wi their distinguished pulpiteers. Such transitory e changes as are now made during the summer vacatio when the clergy are among the flying swallows, are b fugitive experiments at best, and afford little opport nity for more than superficial acquaintanceships.

It is different with the European preacher who com here to settle down in an American pastorate. H finds out two things quickly: First, that the novelty c his treatment of topics familiar to him and his forme flock soon wears off; and, second, that he knows muc less than he thought he did about the subjects that ar uppermost in American minds. Apart from the pre sentation of purely Gospel themes, there are a thousan things that can be treated effectively only by one "t the manner born," and for a stranger to become adep in these is almost equivalent to a new education. Ou extensive territory, mixed population and diverse inter ests together constitute a problem, or rather a series o problems, all of which no one preacher would eve assume to master. New York alone is a life study fo any pastor, and the same may be said of many othe large cities. It is not surprising, therefore, that th foreign pastor, however brilliant he may have been o his native heath, and concerning the questions affectin his own country and people, should fail, after a while to satisfy the expectations of the average America audience or congregation. If he does not fail, it is be cause he must be a man of unusual gifts and remark able adaptability.

For the imported pastor, however, there is always on safe ground: The universal Gospel. By giving to hi people the old yet ever-new Message of Salvation, h avoids the blunders and pitfalls that are certain to en tangle one who is unfamiliar with the intricate an complex phases of life in a land to which he is a new comer. Religion and good morals are a vantage groun which affords scope enough for the most intellectua preacher. In fighting the battle against sin on tha ground, he can render the best service for his Maste and for humanity.

Among the Workers

—Rev. Dr. Henry M. Morey of Michigan will speak in a numbe of cities this fall and winter in the interest of the America Inlan Mission, presenting the claims of some four millions who inhabi the great ranges of the Alleghany and Cumberland Mountains.

—Miss Sarah Allgood, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., one of the subscribers of The Christian Herald, was honored by a "recog nition service" on October 15, at the Baptist Church. She ha been sixty years a Sunday School teacher.

—A Valuable addition to the evangelistic forces comes in the persons of Mr. and Mrs. John H. Roberts, of Leicester, England After fifteen years' experience in conducting Gospel temperanc work in Great Britain, these successful workers have set thei faces toward a tour of the world for the advancement of temper ance. Their first campaign in America has just closed at Fal River, Mass., where they gained three hundred and sixty signa tures to the Gospel Temperance Pledge, besides a gratifying num ber of decisions for Christ.

Royal Sisters at Home

LOVE for their girlhood home has prompted Queen Alexandra of England and the Empress Dowager of Russia to acquire joint possession of a beautiful residence near Copenhagen, Denmark. The two royal ladies have always been tenderly attached to one another from childhood. Since their marriages they have regularly met every year under the paternal roof. The late Czar used to accompany his wife on her annual visits bringing their children with them. His death and the release of his widow from state cares, has left her free to extend her visits to the Danish capital, where she has been generally joined by her favorite sister from England. Now that both the King and Queen of Denmark are dead the ladies miss the hospitality of their royal parents. It is true that their brother, the present King of Denmark, has given them cordial welcome, but they felt they would better enjoy the seclusion they both crave by having a home of their own. The King has furnished it for their occupation with quaint articles with which they were familiar in their girlhood and Queen Alexandra has brought for the adornment of the walls, a number of fine water colors painted by members of the British royal family, some of whom are skilled artists. After the Queen's visit to her daughter, the Queen of Norway, is concluded, she expects to take formal possession of the new residence, and await the coming of her sister from Russia. The visit will be one of increased happiness since the cordial feeling resulting from the Anglo-Russian treaty has replaced the hostility that has existed between the two nations for more than half a century. The royal ladies will now have a retreat where, forgetting the affairs of state and the etiquette of courts, they may enjoy one another's society and carry on in complete freedom the acts of charity for which both are renowned. Each deserves the encomium which Lemuel's mother bestowed on the princess of her day.

She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy. (Prov. 31: 20).

Marconi's Triumph

An epoch-making event occurred on October 16, when wireless communication was established between this continent and Europe. Mr. Marconi has been toiling for over six years to effect this great triumph. Messages have now been sent to and fro between Glace Bay, N. S., and Clifden, Ireland. It was early in 1901 that Mr. Marconi succeeded in sending a wireless message from the Isle of Wight to the Lizard on the Cornish coast, a distance of 183 miles. Scientists warned him that the curvature of the earth would prevent his sending messages across the Atlantic, but he persevered and his experiments in Europe encouraged him to proceed. In 1902 he sent messages from Poldhu in Cornwall to Cronstadt in Russia, a distance of 1,400 miles. The system has now been opened for regular commercial and newspaper service, and Mr. Marconi declares that it can be depended upon for continuous operation. The first westward message was received by the New York Times from its London agent, and the first eastward message was sent by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada, to the London Standard. Messages of congratulation were also received from many eminent statesmen. During the day ten thousand words were sent—not over the wires but through the air, finding their way to their distant destination. It is a great wonder that would have been deemed incredible by our forefathers. It is no longer so futile as the apostle thought it to entrust our words to the atmosphere.

Ye shall speak into the air. (I. Cor. 14: 9.)

A Prince in Training

The Emperor of Germany has determined on a course of education for his eldest son, that is believed to be without precedent. Foreseeing the time when he will have the task of ruling his country, he is setting him to the work of familiarizing himself with official duties. He has placed him in a subordinate position in the Department of the Interior in Berlin, with orders to work his way up through its various offices, as much like an ordinary government employee as possible. His desire is that the young man familiarize himself with the details of administration so that when, in the course of nature, he comes to the throne, he may understand, by practical experience, the system of government. This is a radical departure from the ordinary method of training an heir. It is strange that the innovation should be made by a monarch who holds such decided ideas of the divine right of kings. It would appear that he is aware that the right does not always include the ability to govern wisely.

The Queen of England and the Dowager Empress of Russia

By a man of understanding and knowledge the state thereof shall be prolonged. (Prov. 28: 2.)

The Children are Repaid

Payment has recently been made to the son and daughter of a deceased merchant of a sum of money he disbursed about sixty years ago. It appears that at that time he was in business with a partner in New York. The business became depressed, and finally the losses grew to such proportions that it was abandoned. The assets would not cover the liabilities, and the partner being unable to meet his share of the deficiency became bankrupt. The merchant met his share and there was no legal obligation for him to do more; but when he found that his partner was unable to pay, he assumed the whole liability and discharged it. Subsequently he went to Iowa, and the New York people lost sight of him. The bankrupt partner had two children, one of whom some years later married a man who became a millionaire. She is now an elderly lady, and when she heard recently that her father's former partner had died in comparative poverty, she determined to pay to his children ten thousand dollars, being the sum with interest that he had paid sixty years before on her father's account. Thus after a long interval the good deed done by the father has borne fruit for his children.

All the day long he dealeth graciously and lendeth, and his seed is blessed. (Ps. 37: 26.)

Wireless Telephones at Sea

A dispatch from Washington, D. C., reports that a naval officer has been sent to Norfolk, Va., to install wireless telephones on the battleships Virginia and Connecticut. It is said to be the intention of the Navy Department to put wireless telephones on all the vessels of the Atlantic fleet. The instrument to be tested is the invention of a Danish engineer. It has the advantage that in the event of its failure the telephone can be cut out and worked with a Morse key like the regular wireless telegraph instrument. The wireless telephone has been operated successfully for a distance of twenty-two miles. Communication for five miles is comparatively easy. It can be utilized by the commanding officer of a fleet to call up the captains of the various ships and talk with them without leaving his cabin. Another advantage of wireless telephone communication is that it would not be interfered with by fogs, which often render communication by signals and lights impossible. Thus the great danger of collision in fogs, which is very serious, when, as in the projected voyage of our fleet, a number of vessels are proceeding in company, is diminished. The captain of a ship would heed a warning reaching his ear by this mysterious agency. He would not act as many do who go on in a dangerous course in spite of the warnings that God gives them in his Word.

God sent to them by his messengers, because he had compassion on his people; but they despised his words, and misused his prophets, till the wrath of the Lord arose, till there was no remedy. (II Chron. 36: 15, 16.)

Careless Correspondents

The Postal Department at Washington, D. C., makes an astonishing report for the month of September. In its dead letter office, to which all letters are sent that for any reason cannot be delivered, over one million pieces of mail matter were examined during the month. Some of these had been mailed without any address, others had a defective address, and on others the addresses were illegible. The letters were opened and in all cases in which the writers had written their address, the letters were returned to them. Of the 1,006,997 letters thus handled, the experts were able to return 235,961 to the senders. It is a singular fact that a large number of these letters contained money. No less a sum than $5,351 was found in them, of which $4,471 was returned to the senders. Doubtless in many cases these writers blamed their correspondents for not replying to their communications, and probably not a few cast suspicion on the postal officers, or charged them with carelessness or inattention to duty. This report shows that the writers should have blamed themselves for not fulfilling the conditions by which alone their letters could be delivered. It is possible that many who claim that their prayers are unanswered might find by self examination that the cause of failure is with them.

If I regard iniquity in my heart the Lord will not hear me (Ps. 66: 18.)

A Forlorn Burial

A newspaper of Kalamazoo, Mich., describes a remarkable funeral which took place at a cemetery near that city recently. The deceased had lived in Kalamazoo for forty years, and had always been a man of good character. He took a lively interest in local politics and in the development of the city. He gained a livelihood by driving a dray until last year, when he fell from the seat of the vehicle in an accident and striking the curb on his head became unconscious. He was taken to the hospital, but insanity developed and he was removed to the asylum, where he died. So far as could be learned he had no near relatives, but friends and neighbors made up a $50 purse to pay for his interment. No one, however, came to attend the funeral. Only the undertaker and the Superintendent of the Poor Farm were present. They did not think it necessary to hold any funeral service. There was no service either at the asylum or at the cemetery. The two men, with the assistance of the gravedigger, lowered the coffin into the grave and immediately filled it up as they talked with one another of the forlorn burial. The prayers that might have been offered and the tears that might have been shed by grieving mourners could not have benefited the dead, but their absence was significant. No one would like to be buried in that way, as if he were a mere animal. One cannot but wonder whether the dead [illegible] with friends who should have been grateful for friendly services, but were only [illegible] whether he had lived [illegible] as that of the ancient king [illegible] people wrote, a man [illegible] no one any good, and whose [illegible] like his.

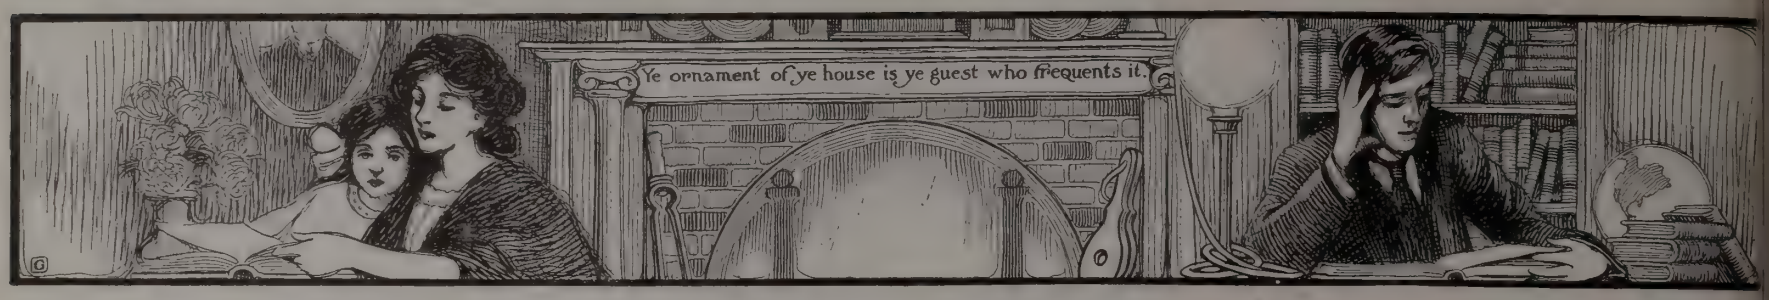
AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



At Home in the Church

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

TWO young women were walking home after their day's work. As they paused a moment to say good night at a corner, one asked the other where she was going to church the next day. The answer was suggestive. "I think I shall go to the First Church on Blank Street, and I wish you would go with me. I will call for you. When one goes to some churches in this town one is given a seat and treated politely, but at the old First they meet you at the door and shake hands, and you feel at once that you are at home."

The church she referred to is down town in New York, away down among the business streets in a neighborhood from which fashion has gradually retreated. The residential portion of the city is miles distant, and all around this sanctuary are tall apartment houses packed from basement to roof, and blocks of houses, once very elegant, still spacious, and at present occupied either by offices or used as boarding houses to accommodate the large transient population or to shelter respectable people who are, in a sense, homeless. No true home can be made for very long in a boarding house.

The country is constantly sending to the city vast throngs of young men and women who soon lose the feeling of belonging anywhere. In their home villages they counted for something in the church, and they regularly attended the Sunday School and the Christian Endeavor. Their places were seldom vacant at morning service and very likely they sang in the choir. Coming to the city, at work all day, returning tired at evening to a house where they lodge, getting meals in convenient restaurants, going to bed utterly weary on Saturday night and finding themselves strangers in church on Sunday morning, they easily drift away from the former moorings. In a little while, unless these young people can be enveloped in warm friendliness and made at home in a church, they will learn to spend their Sundays partly in sleep and partly in strolling about parks and desultory visiting among friends.

A church that sets out with the object of gathering these people into its fold, making them at home, acquainting them with one another and giving them something to do, is a church that emphatically is busy in Christ's work. Notwithstanding charges to the contrary, there are many such churches in the metropolis, and they are showing themselves equal to the occasion and joyful in their great opportunity. One such church is open, for instance, for three preaching services on the Lord's day and is practically filled by three separate and distinct congregations. The pastor and his assistants do not expect the same people to occupy the pews at each service. Among working people husbands and wives cannot always leave their little children and go together to church. They must divide the care of their family, and if John attends in the morning while Mary cooks the dinner and rocks the baby, it is only fair that Mary should go in the afternoon and John remain at home to look after the little one.

A church in these days, if it would grandly and nobly do its work, must be an edifice of many rooms besides the auditorium, and those rooms must be open every evening with something going on that is practical, friendly and interesting in each of them. Nor to this end need a church be what is called institutional. It must be a friendly, sympathetic place, and the pastor must know his people and the people must know one another.

A church in its best estate is a big family, a part of that great family that owns our Father in heaven, calls upon him daily, confesses the name of Christ and hopes one day to be gathered in safety evermore beyond the tide in the home of endless felicity. Unless in a church there is the family bond, unless there is fellowship, comradeship and enthusiasm, depression and failure may be anticipated. In our homes we have common interests, outspoken affection and willingness to bear and forbear. In our church home, even though it be impossible to be intimate with every one, we court failure and almost make it inevitable if we meet Sunday after Sunday without recognition, without sympathy, and in a polite isolation. It is entirely possible so to cultivate friendliness in a city church that the pews shall always be full, that every one shall bear a part, and that there may be as much real sociability, as much real help for boys and girls, for fathers and mothers, for the sick, for the sorrowing and for the old, as there is in any little country church lifting its white spire to the blue sky among green hills, or on the shore of the ever sounding sea.

ALL-HALLOW'S EVE

When wanes October, and grave and sober
The bare trees stand that were lately green;
The children hurry with fun and flurry,
For now is the frolic of Hallowe'en.

Wedding Bells

THESE beautiful autumn days, brilliant wi color and crisp of atmosphere, are the da that seem most suitable for weddings. N music is sweeter than the music of the we ding march. The familiar strains, glad and triump ant, the beautiful processional in which the bride a her attendants are the most appealing figures, t solemn ceremonial, so brief yet so thrilling, that pledg two lives to blended union until some far-off ho when death shall part them—how i portant they are in the story of the hom and what influence they have on the w fare of the community! Heaven bl the young people who are starting o together this year, and may all the years be crowned with abundant felici and increasing prosperity! Heaven bl them, especially if they are brave enou to begin the new home in simplicity a to enjoy their day of small things.

In Mrs. Burnett's remarkable boo The Shuttle, just published, no lesson more strongly enforced than the one th the possession of great wealth and splendid station cannot confer happine Contentment sometimes flies from t palace to find its resting place in t lowly cottage.

Whether the wedding bells of this ye chime for the rich or for the poor, t chief essential in both instances is th there shall be true love, and that fro the very first the contracting parti shall remember that their mutual co nant is not to be an experiment, but fact. Entire confidence in one anothe and unbroken frankness with a dete mination never to let a quarrel last ov night, will keep the melody of the we ding bells unbroken from youth to age

The bride's trousseau has enlisted t affectionate concern of her mother a sisters for weeks before the weddin Even more important than her outfit clothing, which need not be cumberson in extent, is the provision for household linen that belongs to the wife's share the furnishings. In Holland and Franc the mother begins filling the linen clos while the little maid is in the cradle, that it may be ready for her daught when the marriage day comes. T number of sheets, pillow slips, tablecloth and towels required by the bride d pends altogether on the size and the sty of her home; but she should not go t her husband empty-handed in this pa ticular.

The young husband is expected to responsible for the general furnishing the home. During the days of courtshi he has laid aside what he could for th purpose, and as the real essentials t comfort are few, it does not require a immense sum at the outset. The furn ture of each room should be simple an durable, and it is better at first to lim the number of purchases to articles a tually required, and to accumulate lat things which are merely ornamental. N costly outlay need be made in these day for carpets and curtains, since it is a mitted by every one that rugs are mor healthful and plain window shades le likely to harbor germs than Axminste beneath the feet and lace at the windows. The be motto for the young people in the beginning of lif is "Love one another wholly, and pay as you go. Keeping in mind these two clauses husband and wif need fear no shipwreck of wedded bliss.

THE GOLDEN RULE SALOON

By Marion Earl

IT was the hour of sunset. The golden afterglow still burned, resplendent gold, above the forest-covered mountains. The beauty and fragrance of the season filled the world with gladness. A young man and a young woman were walking side by side through the long lane that led from the highway just beyond the village limits, up toward the wide sweeps of meadow and pasture land, below the forests, which lay like a mantle green over the mountains. On either side were farm lands. He was talking with great animation; she listened with only an occasional word in response. They passed beyond the land and climbed slowly to the summit of a steep, grassy hill which overlooked the town. It was a favorite haunt. To-night the scene was one of wordless beauty. The afterglow was fading in the west. Below lay the town half hid in the great masses of the foliage of the old shade trees which lined the streets. Beyond lay the lake, narrow and glassy, its length hidden by the projecting hills which rose on either hand. Above the hills beyond the lake the great full moon was climbing. The mingled light of the afterglow and the moon fell like a miracle of soft and tender glory over a world made beautiful by nature. The charm of the hour seemed to rest upon the lovers as they slowly made their way to the rustic bench where the outlook over the valley was fairest.

"Fine, isn't it?" he began.

"It is wonderful!" she said softly.

They talked of various matters for some time. Then he made bold to begin to say something that came readily to his lips, but somehow seemed hard to put into words.

"I've been wondering why we could not be married this summer. We've planned to be so long, just as soon as my business would justify it. I am getting to a point where I shall make plenty of money, and I don't see why we need to wait. What do you say, dear?"

She looked away across the lake and the hills, but did not speak at once.

"There is not a single thing to hinder now. If you will say the word I'll be the happiest man in Clear Lake."

"I want to ask a question, Roy," was her answer in a low, quiet tone.

"Ask a hundred if you want to."

"Is it true that you have traded the grocery for John Burns' saloon and intend to run that, instead?"

The unexpected question as like a lance thrust into a hidden wound.

"Well, suppose I should do that, what difference would it make? We could have a finer home and an easier time in life." He did not speak with the former animation, though he tried to do so. He seemed to be trying to conceal something that troubled him.

"I am afraid, Roy, that it would make all the difference in the world."

The words were so positive that he went on the defensive.

"I don't see any reason why it should."

"But you have not told me if the report is really true."

He saw that she had found out what he intended to conceal from her till after the wedding if possible, and so he admitted that the trade had been made, he to take charge of the saloon in the summer.

"Do you think I ought to go on just the same as if you were in some honest business, and feel the same toward you?"

"Oh, I'm sick of all this nonsense about the saloon business; it is just as honorable as any other." He spoke with vexation.

"If I were the wife of a saloonkeeper, I could not feel that way."

"Why not?"

"Because it contributes nothing to the good of the community, but rather tends to destroy everything that is good. The saloon cannot do business without the creation of an unnatural appetite which means ruin to the man and suffering to all connected with him."

"But what's the difference? If I don't do it, somebody else will."

"No manly man will. No good citizen who cares for the best interests of the community will. A real man does what is right, not what other people will do. It is no argument in favor of the murderer to say that other men would do the same under the circumstances."

"It is simply unreasonable to compare a saloonkeeper to a murderer," he interposed.

"How is it better to do a man to death mentally, spiritually and physically in the course of years, than to shoot him instantly?"

"'How can I respect a saloonkeeper?' asked May"

"It seems to me that you are unreasonable, May; we didn't come up here to argue on temperance. I want to drop it."

"I am willing, if you will promise me to drop the trade for the saloon and never touch it again."

"Really, May, I don't consider that your affair. It is not a woman's place to run the business for a man. If a man provides for his home liberally, that is all that concerns a woman."

"Some women may feel that way, but I never could. I never could marry any man who thought so."

"But I think so."

"Oh, Roy! I am so disappointed in you! When I heard what you had done I did not believe it. I never thought you could do such a thing, and I cannot believe even now that you mean to do it."

"The papers are signed and I can't back out. And really I don't see any reason to make such a fuss about it. I don't see why we can't go on as we have planned so long, and be married right away."

"Because you are not the man you were, or else——" She paused as if unwilling to finish the sentence, "or else I did not understand you."

"I don't believe you ever loved me," he almost growled defiantly. "A little thing like that ought not to make any difference between people who love each other."

"I loved a true, noble man once; but how can I respect a saloonkeeper? No, Roy, you are not the man to whom I promised to yield my life, not unless you will cast this temptation aside and be the man it is possible for you to be."

"You are excited, May, and had better take time to think it over.

"I have done nothing else but think of it since I heard about your trade. I am as fully determined as I ever could be."

"So am I. I shall stick to my bargain. If I run a respectable place I am just as good as any one."

For reply she slipped the ring from her finger and handed it to him.

Not many weeks later he opened his place with the blasphemous words, "Golden Rule Saloon," over the door.

CHAPTER II

WHEN Roy Lee came into possession of the saloon he changed the name, and, as he thought, the nature of the place. He boasted a purpose to run a "strictly first class" business. In the advertisement that appeared in a local paper he said that the saloon had become a necessity in every well-regulated community that it contributed to the financial prosperity of the town, and that he would be sorry with all the objection one possibly could offer to the business be keeping a respectable place and carefully obeying all the laws for the regulation of the business. He would treat his customers in a fair and honorable manner, hence the name, "Golden Rule." Being experienced and never having formed the habit of indulging in drink, he was for the most part sincere in what he said. To him the business made appeal as one in which there were large profits.

In order to bring the surroundings up to the standard of excellence to which he intended to keep the business, Lee closed the saloon for a week after he took possession, and put costly furnishings in place of the old ordinary ones. New floors, a paneled ceiling, a marble-topped bar, comfortable upholstered chairs, fine plate glass mirrors, and costly pool and card tables. Then came the day of the opening. The place was thrown wide to the town, and one free drink was served to every man who would walk up to the bar and accept it. The new proprietor was not disappointed in the crowd. All day and far into the night the place thronged with men, some of whom came from curiosity, and some to get a free drink. They admired the furnishings and praised the owner. And the popularity of the Golden Rule Saloon was assured.

Late in the evening a man entered who, viewed from the rear, had the appearance of a minister, because of his erect carriage and the cut of the long black coat. But a glimpse of the face would dispel any such illusion. The history of his life was written in the manner with which he withdrew the cigar stump from his lips, after having sucked all the nastiness out of it, and cast it into the cuspidor. The story was that of one who had tried to feed his soul with sensual delight, and was weary and disgusted with the result, yet was without inclination to change his course. The show of his countenance witnessed against him. The forehead had an intellectual cast. The fine silvery beard was neatly trimmed; but the eyes were bloodshot, the nose unnaturally red and the mouth course and lustful. He was a man of considerable wealth, who had served several terms as State senator. The title he still bore, but the olden intellectual power which had made him a force in the political world was sapped by his excessive vice. Now he lived in a good house down by the lake, and spent most of his time in drinking and sleeping off the effects of liquor.

"I want to congratulate you Lee," he began. "You have a fine place. There is nothing like it this side of the city. You are a benefactor to the town; a man can come in here and drink like a gentleman. This is no place for a fellow who makes a swine of himself. Just follow out the lines you have laid down and you will reform such and lift them up where they will act like men."

While they were talking a tall, heavily built, red-faced individual, with a heavy mustache and an unmistakable air of carelessness about person and dress, came up to the door and looked in. The senator saw him and called out, "Its just as cheap, Marvin, to come in and look out."

The newcomer sauntered in and up to the bar.

"Why, good evening, Mr. Marvin," was Lee's salutation. "Glad to see you here."

He gave the visitor a cordial shake of the hand. "What will you take?" he added with a pleasing smile.

"Have to take something, do we?" Marvin asked, looking along the display of goods.

THE DAY OF DECISION IN ISRAEL

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN this month of Thanksgiving, this story of a great service is timely, recalling to us gratitude for national mercies by renewed consecration. The vale of Shechem was as a vast cathedral for the Israelites, with its mountains on either side—Mount Gerizim on one side, and Mount Ebal on the other. It had been appointed by Moses, who in his farewell address charged the Israelites that after crossing the Jordan they should set up an altar at Shechem and offer sacrifices and plaster stones and write upon them the words of God's law.

It was his command also that the whole law should be read to the people seated upon the mountains, and that they should respond to the reading with blessings for those who should keep the law, and cursings for those who should disobey it. This gathering was not possible until after the victory at Ai. Then it was held as a most solemn and impressive occasion to prepare the people for the conquest of the land.

Twenty-five years have passed, and again Joshua has called a convocation at Shechem: this time for the princes and judges and elders and officers of the tribes of Israel. It is to be a "men's meeting" on a large scale. The land having been allotted, the homes are too far distant to admit of the coming of the women and children, or even of all of the men. Joshua would make it an official meeting, authoritative in character. It was to be the occasion of his last address, for he was now one hundred and ten years old, and knew that the hour of his departure was at hand. Alas! he had discovered plague spots of idolatry among God's people, who in secret in the privacy of their tents worshiped idols, while in the open they worshiped the true God.

Renewed Consecration

Joshua had a radical cure for this. The calling together of the officials in the sacred vale was the first step. Then he recounted to them how their father Abraham had been called by God to come out from among idol worshipers that from him might spring a God-fearing nation, and how from then until now he had delivered them from famine, from slavery and from other perils until he had brought them to the good land and large, which he had given to them for their very own. And then Joshua called upon them to put away the idol gods and serve only Jehovah the true God. And the men of the assembly answered: "Far be it from us that we should forsake Jehovah, and serve other gods." And Joshua said: "As for me and my house, we will serve Jehovah." And they replied: "We also will serve Jehovah, for he is our God." And Joshua said: "If ye forsake him and serve other gods, he will do you evil and consume you." And the men responded in stronger, firmer tones than before: "Nay, but we will serve Jehovah." And Joshua, to make it sure, put their vow in writing. He wrote it even upon the book of the Law itself, to be placed beside the holy Ark of the Covenant, and to be read to all of Israel once in seven years.

Then, to make the keeping of the promise still more sure, Joshua took a great stone, and set it up as a monument there in the valley of Shechem, that it might be a sign and witness against them if they did not keep their promise to put away all idols, and serve only the true God. Then the gathering was dismissed, and shortly after Joshua died and was buried in the hill country of Ephraim, the portion of the land in which he had dwelt. When the judges, the elders and the officers returned to their homes there was undoubtedly a great destruction of hidden idols, for it is recorded that "all Israel served Jehovah all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua."

The Promises Contingent

Now therefore fear Jehovah and serve him. "Therefore" connects this great conclusion with its promises, the many mercies of God in Israel, to the day when God called Abraham from a land of idols (verses 3-13) to found a nation he could use to save the world. So in this Thanksgiving month we recall not only a year of family mercies, but also national blessings from the discovery of America by Columbus, cross in hand, and the landing of the Pilgrims. There are many providential victories in history of which the thoughtful man is bound to say, as did Joshua in like case, "Not with thy sword nor with thy bow" (verse 12). Paul was using an argument like Joshua's when he said, "I beseech you, therefore, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice" (Rom. 12: 1). "Despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" (Rom. 2: 4.) This is memory's part of the year, and it is well to consider what we should remember, and what we should forget. It is not creditable to human nature that we have "such bad memories" when it comes to texts, and such when it comes to debts; mercies take so much less tenacious hold of our memories than grudges; that adversity drives us to God oftener than prosperity. That is why Isaiah puts afflictions in a list of God's loving kindnesses. Surely in this month when we review the year and recall God's gifts of day and night, of joy and sorrow, we should come to such a "valley of decision" as Israel found at Shechem. Mercies demand that not our memories alone, but our wills shall act. Therefore fear the Lord and serve him.

Put away the gods which your fathers served. This connects with the exhortation to serve God in sincerity and in truth. That means the same as the hymn "true-hearted, whole-hearted." Many in Israel were worshiping God publicly, and idols privately, like Rachel, in whose camel saddle hidden idols were found. How amazing this reference to idols only twenty-five years after the miraculous entrance into Palestine! Indeed, it is the puzzle of Hebrew history, the propensity Israel showed to turn from their God of might to petty images.

Universal Idolatry

They had hidden gods in Egypt, and even moulded a golden calf for worship in the shadows of Sinai. But who of modern peoples shall cast the stone at them? Surely not awakening Japan, where manufactured gods and whirring dynamos jostle each other. Not Italy, where thousands look to the alleged bones of saints for the healing of their diseases. And not any American who is afraid of Friday or of thirteen. Joshua's command, translated for twentieth century Europe and America, is: "Put away your superstitions." A young fellow who cherished that absurd superstition that opening the Bible at random will bring a special message from God, opened one day to the words, "Cast thyself down, for it is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee." Not pausing to note that this was a temptation of the devil that Christ put aside, he straightway leaped from his second story window. During the fourteen days that his bruises kept him abed, let us hope he found in his experience a "therefore" for putting away at least that one of his superstitions. Those respectable idols that some are called to put away—for whatever takes a higher place in our hearts than God is an idol—are Fame and Wealth and Pleasure. "Take good heed therefore unto yourselves that ye love the Lord your God." In us all there are mixed motives, but we have put away idols if we can honestly say that God's law is dominant, and other interests are subordinate to him as the real King of our lives.

A Call to Action

Choose ye this day whom ye will serve. This is the very soul of the lesson—a clarion call to every human will to act. Outside of God the greatest thing in the universe is a human will, deciding swiftly, persisting unchangeably. One good choice often shapes a life. A choice like Joshua's is first an act and then a state, first decision, then persistence. Probably no one ever chose to be a wicked man once for all in real life. It is by many evil choices that fixedness in evil is reached. "Sow an act, and you reap a tendency; sow a tendency, and you reap a habit; sow a habit, and you reap a character; sow a character, and you reap a destiny."

Martyr Courage

"Decision of character" is rightly counted one of the supreme qualities of manhood, which means a will that is quick, but not a "quitter." In business and politics and religion alike we need the man who, when opportunity confronts him, is able to decide rightly and quickly, and hold fast to his decision. What a rebuke to the cowardly hesitation of many to follow convictions in open confession of Christ there is in the firm decisions of the martyrs, many of whom were women and children, whom no fears could silence. During the persecutions of "Bloody Mary" in England, a Christian woman was called before Bishop Bonner, who threatened that if she did not renounce her Protestant faith he would take away her husband. She replied, "Christ is my husband." "I will take away thy child." "Christ is better to me than ten sons." "I will strip thee of all possessions and comforts." "But Christ is mine." And so she passed to the martyr's crown. No wonder God put in the list of victors in Hebrews 11 those heroes of faith who were "slain with the sword!" Against these successes of those who seemed to fail, let us set the failures of those who seem to succeed by wrong decisions. Will your choice today be a wrong and ruinous choice like that of Adam, Lot, Balaam, Rehoboam, Ahab, Ananias? Or will it be such a choice as that of Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Josiah, Daniel, Paul? "Choose ye this day" by adopting the following words of decision used in all lands by the Y. M. C. A.:

> Forsaking every known sin, and making the Word of God my guide, I take and will confess Jesus Christ to be my Saviour and Lord, the Holy Spirit to be my helper; and this I do deliberately, unswervedly and forever.

As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord. In ancient times the head of the family usually decided the religious status of the whole family. But even to-day, when we recognize the sacred individuality of every human soul, when one member of a household chooses Christ with whole-hearted earnestness it often results in the saving of the whole household. One who really lives his religion in his home can hardly fail to make it a Christian home at last, if not at first. It is a mistake that we so often cut short that promise, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." "Come thou and all thy house unto the ark." There are no homes so safe against discord and division as those in which father, mother and children all meet about the cross on earth, and so are assured of meeting in heaven.

> When soon or late we reach that coast,
> O'er life's rough ocean driven,
> May we arrive, no wanderer lost,
> One family in heaven.

If ye forsake the Lord . . . he will consume you. Joshua was not like those who talk of rewards but not of punishments. He told the Israelites that as God had kept all his promises of blessing, he would likewise fulfil his promises of punishment if they broke their vows of obedience. God's warnings are born of the same love as his blessings, even as Jonathan's warning arrows were prompted by the same covenant love for David as his gifts of robe and sword and girdle. Evil company, said Joshua, will bring to you snares, traps, scourges, thorns; leading at length to idolatry and destruction. (See Heb. 3: 12; 10: 38.)

"The Christian Herald Calendar for 1908 is a gem of artistic perfection. Anything more bewitchingly quaint, more charmingly childlike than "Little Sunshine in Church" it has not been my good fortune to see.

A Delightful Study in Color

"The exquisite small maiden, a mother's darling, is sitting by herself in a high-backed pew, which forms a rich background for her delicately poised head and graceful little figure. She is dressed as a child of her rosebud type should be, in garb of softly shimmering pink; her gray beaver hat is tied under her dimpled chin by gauzy ribbons of blossom tint, and her pretty hands are folded inside a great fluffy muff.

366 Benedictions

"But the essential loveliness of the picture is in the sweet and thoughtful face of the child, for whom the setting is an appropriate frame. Whoever is so happy as to receive as unsurpassed gem of art as an addition to the treasures that adorn the home, will be sure of a benediction every day in the year."

Questions and Answers

R. M., Brooklyn, N. Y. How many public and school libraries are there in New York State?

The latest report of the State Educational Department shows 9,173 libraries in the various school districts. One thousand four hundred and sixty districts had none. There are 382 free circulating libraries, 395 public libraries and thirty-one Carnegie libraries.

Reader, Washington, D. C. Please tell me the meaning of the Parable of the Tares, Matt. 13: 24-30?

Christian scholars are not in agreement as to the meaning. The question is as to the meaning of the word "world" in verse 38. On the one hand some hold that the world means the human race from the beginning; others, on the other hand, hold that it refers to the church. Dr. W. M. Taylor, whose work on the Parables is always valuable, holds that it refers to the church, and that the Parable is a warning against persecution and also consolation to the pastor, by showing him that Christ foresaw the evil which discourages him. There would be tares among the wheat to the end, but in the end the discrimination impossible to the pastor would be made by the angels.

M. E. D., Lynville, La. 1. When did the French attempt to dig the Panama Canal, and why did they give up the project? 2. When did the Americans start to dig a canal at Panama? 3. How long have people thought that such a canal was a possibility?

1 and 2. In 1876 an organization was started called the Societe Civile Internationale du Canal Interoceanique. They started surveys and secured from the Colombian government a permit to construct the canal. In 1879 a scientific congress, under the chairmanship of Ferdinand de Lesseps, decided on a sea-level canal, to be located on the Isthmus of Panama. Operations began in 1883. In 1889 the company, formed after the congress of 1879, became bankrupt. A new company was formed in 1894 and kept at work on a small scale until May, 1904. The United States government acquired the property at that time. 3. Within twenty years after the discovery of the isthmus, a canal was seriously considered. A Spanish survey for a canal was made in 1521. About 1610 Samuel de Champlain, who discovered Lake Champlain, visited the isthmus, and proposed to his king that the French build a canal. The United States first took up the idea in 1875.

W. H. T., Villisca, Ia. 1. Is there any passage in the Bible that tells about giving a tenth of your earnings? 2. Also a passage about people sinning daily?

1. See Num. 18: 26, Deut. 12: 17 and 14:28, Amos 4:4, Mal. 3:10 and many other passages. 2. You probably refer to the passage in I. John 1: 8-10.

C. F., Westminster, Mass. Was there ever such a person as Faust?

Faustus lived about 1500 A. D. He was supposed to be a professor of magic by the people of his day. Science was supposed to have a close relationship to magic, and his researches accounted for his reputation. Goethe's dramatic poem of Faust was first printed in 1790.

P. R., Hoboken, N. J. Has a good moral man, a believer in Christ but not a worker in the vineyard nor a church member, as good a chance for salvation as one who is a church member and doing the work of the Master?

Why should a good moral man, who believes in the Lord Jesus, stand aloof from His church and deny himself all the precious privileges of Christian fellowship? The church is the ordained channel through which the full tide of Gospel blessing flows, and while one may find ways of doing good outside of it, he misses much and stands in danger of spiritual stagnation. It is easy to criticize the church and to find fault. What we like to see is the man or woman who clings loyally to the church and tries by every means to strengthen and help it in its Gospel mission. The good qualities of a soldier are shown best in the ranks of active service, not when he is away from the army. It is the same in the army of Christ. Of course, men can be saved outside of the church; but their true and proper sphere is within its ranks, under the banner of the Cross.

I. N., Richmond, Va. What was the central idea of the philosophy of the Greek Epicurus, who lived about 300 B.C?

He taught that "the greatest good consists of peace of mind springing from virtue." At the present time the name epicurean is frequently applied to those who live for pleasure alone.

Texas Reader. What is gamboge?

It is a pigment and also a medicine. It was first brought from India by the Dutch in 1600. At the present time most of it is imported from Cambodia, Cochin China, and Siam. It is taken from trees of the guttifera order.

Observer. What is a widow's interest in her second husband's property—cash, not houses or lands? If he dies leaving his money by will to his children, can the widow claim any share of such money?

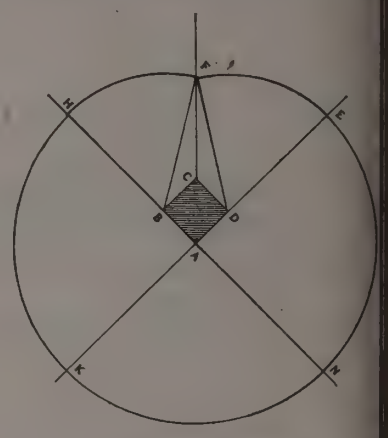
In New York, a husband may leave all his personal property, such as cash and securities and personal effects, by will to any one he pleases. His real estate in New York is subject to his widow's right of dower. That is, she has the right, during her life, to the use of one-third the real estate. The husband cannot deprive her of this right of dower. In other States the law is different. Consult a lawyer in the State where the husband was living at the time of his death.

The "cow and barn puzzle," which appeared in THE MAIL-BAG some time ago, has excited much attention among our readers, a number of whom have sent in solutions of the puzzle. The puzzle was as follows:

Mrs. ——, Washington, D. C. Will you kindly solve the following problem for me: A cow is tied with a rope 100 feet long to the corner of a barn 25 feet square. How much ground can the cow graze over?

Simple as it seems, it is, however, by no means an easy problem, and the answers were so varied that we submitted the problem to an authority, Edward E. Whitford, Professor of Mathematics of the College of the City of New York. Professor Whitford's working out of the problem is given in full below:

"If the barn were not in the way the area to be grazed over would be just that of a circle 100 feet in radius. As it is, at the first corner turned the radius is taken up 25 feet; and also the area represented by the barn cannot be grazed over. In the figure suppose A B C D represents the barn, A being the point at which the cow is tied. The line N E F H K represents the outer boundary of the grazing area. The arcs with D and B as centres meet at the point F half way round from the starting point A. For convenience in measuring the area F C D E, it is divided by a line F D, forming a triangle F C D, with sides F D = 75 and C D = 25 and angle F C D = 135°, and a sec F D E with F D and D E, each eq to 75. Since in a triangle the sines angles have the same ratio as their oppos sides, sine C F D = $\frac{25}{75}$ sin 135° = .23 Whence angle C F D = 13° 37' 59".



Prof. Whitford's Diagram

gle F D C = 180° — (135° + 13° 37' 59" 31° 22' 1". Since the area of a trian is equal to one-half the product of t sides and the sine of the included ang the area of F C D = ½ x 25 x 75 x sin 22' 31" = 487.988. The sines of ang are found from trigonometric tables. sector is such a part of a whole circle the angle is a part of 360°. In the sec F D E, the angle F D E is found by su tracting 31° 22' 1" from 90°, giving 37' 59". Reducing this and 360° each seconds, the area of the sector F D E $\frac{211079}{1296000}$ x 3.14159 x 5625 = 2878.143, the area of a whole circle is 3.14159 tim the square of its radius. Triangle and se tor added give 3366.131. Two triang and two sectors of this shape give 6732.26 and this added to ¾ the area of the circ with the full radius 100, which is 23561.94 gives 30,294.207 square feet as the area the ground which the cow can graze over

Many of our readers have worked o the problem. Correct solutions were se by E. J. Settle, Virginia; A. T. Wixso New York; W. W. Strong, Pennsylvani and "Subscriber." The following have se answers, worked out in full:

THE NEW STATUE OF GENERAL SIGEL

IN honor of General Sigel, who played a distinguished part in the late Civil War, there has been unveiled a fine equestrian statue on Riverside Drive, New York City. The figure and horse are of bronze, and the General is in the attitude of reining in his horse. Governor Hughes was the orator of the day, and there were on the platform with him distinguished officers and relatives of the General whose memory they had come to honor. The military parade was one of the most brilliant ever seen in New York. Thousands of regulars and State troops were in line. In one division were many German societies of New York, New Jersey and neighboring States.

An Ever Memorable Tour

Mr. Alexander started out with Dr. Torrey on an All-Around-the-World Tour of Evangelization. Over One Hundred Thousand converts were made, and in a single meeting over 7,000 arose to testify to the Saving Grace of Our Lord. This Book chronicles not only the Marvelous Scenes of this Never-to-be-forgotten Tour, which has influenced tens of thousands of lives, but it also records Mr. Alexander's revisitation of scenes of his former triumphs, when multitudes unnumbered tendered him such a welcome as is rarely accorded to mortal man. The story is simply told and enriched with many graphic illustrations.

Read What Margaret E. Sangster Says of Our Beautiful 1908 CALENDAR

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD CALENDAR for 1908 is a dream of artistic perfection. Anything more bewitchingly dainty, more charmingly childlike, more radiantly beautiful than "Little Sunshine in Church" it has not been my good fortune to see.

The exquisite small maiden, a mother's darling, is sitting by herself in a high-backed pew, which forms a rich background for her delicately poised head and graceful little figure. She is dressed as a child of her rosebud type should be, in a garb of softly shimmering pink; her gray beaver hat is tied under her dimpled chin by gauzy ribbons of blossom tint, and her pretty hands are folded inside a great fluffy muff of sober brown. The Calendar is a study in color, with tones that melt and shade one into another in absolute harmony.

But the essential loveliness of the picture is in the sweet and thoughtful face of the child, for whom the setting is an appropriate frame.

Whoever is so happy as to receive this unsurpassed gem of art as an addition to the treasures that adorn the home, will be sure of a benediction every day in the year.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

An Able Book on Japan

ONE of the ablest Japanese in the United States, Masuji Miyakawa, D.C.L., LL.D., an author of high repute, lecturer of the Law School of Indiana University and the first Japanese attorney admitted to the American bar, has written a book entitled Life of Japan, which is apparently destined to attract considerable attention from American readers. In a literary sense alone—being written in the English language—it is a remarkable production. But it is still more remarkable because of its comprehensiveness and the able and vigorous manner in which the writer discusses many topics which, at the present time, are of the greatest interest to the people of both nations.

The opening chapter deals with the wonderful progress of the Japanese empire. The secret of that progress Mr. Miyakawa declares to be the ability of the Japanese people to "introduce and assimilate the learning and science of the United States and Europe."

"Japan has acted on the national principle of adopting what is best from every country and entering into an honorable rivalry in culture and civilization with all the nations of the world."

He reviews the Japanese religions, tells of the introduction of Christianity, discusses at length Japan's system of "moral ethics," the Japanese woman, native customs and habits, the feudal system and its overthrow and Japan's medieval foreign intercourse.

An interesting chapter is that which tells of Japan's romantic relations to the United States. Perry is everywhere regarded as the country's national redeemer.

All the stupendous advancement, the intellectual, commercial and national progress of Japan is the sequel of this memorable expedition. To-day the name of Matthew Galbraith Perry is emblazoned in imperishable marble at Kurihama, where he landed, in token of Japan's gratitude.

The triumphs of American diplomacy make a chapter of themselves. America, through these relations, became "Japan's foster-mother and moral ally."

In succeeding chapters, the financial system of Japan, her industrial development and her wonderfully efficient army and navy are discussed. The author next tells of education under the old regime and to-day. A large section is devoted to the consideration of Japan's constitutional government and its gradual development. The concluding chapter discusses the world's outlook for peace and arbitration. The writer says:

It was only after Japan in her war with Russia proved that she could kill more men in one land battle than in all the land battles of the Crimean War, that Japan could send to the bottom more ships and seamen in one naval battle than in all the battles in Nelson's Trafalgar and Dewey's Manila Bay that the civilized world received Japan as a first-class civilized Power and her people as a civilized people.

It was this mock civilization, this warlike humanity that forced and is now forcing the Japanese to expand their army and navy as far and sometimes farther than their national economy can reach. . . .

If Japan ever be prepared to strike any nation, if Japan ever be skilled in science and art of war, it is not because Japan is a warlike nation, but because she has to carry out the mandate of the civilized world.

Concerning the recent San Francisco troubles, the author has this passage:

The so-called anti-Japanese movement in San Francisco, after all, shall never be the cause for a Japanese-American war. It is far from it. Industrial or racial conflict in San Francisco is trivial in quantity when comparing any such experience with those other races or nationalities have had. It is insignificant in the scope of the interests involved, for the thinking people of the single city together with all the rest of the State of California are more sympathetic toward the Japanese than the antagonistics. So are also the entire Pacific States. East of the Rockies is filled with the friends of the Japanese, who love to see the Japanese prosperity and progress. Should Japanese in San Francisco hope, as a colony, to be successful in this country like the other races or nationalities, they have yet to see their tracks covered with the bones of martyrs who have perished in the struggle, by stone, by fire.

If, unfortunately, the Japanese, either by racial prejudice or industrial consideration, are to be looted or discriminated against, there are other means for adjustment; and those means are illustrated by the Americans themselves in Japan. Did not the Japanese at one time, in obedience to anti-foreign sentiment, commit outrages on the American residents in Japan? Did not the Japanese Romines assassinate the American diplomatic agent in the street of Yedo? Did not the Japanese roughs and hoodlums set fire to the American Legation? Did not the Japanese, animated by race prejudice, commit violence unimaginable, resulting in driving all the Americans and Europeans out of the city of Yedo?

The author gives ten good and sufficient reasons why a war between Japan and the United States is improbable. He says, in conclusion:

For the matchless progress of enlightened rule during the last half century the world is indebted to the United States and Japan. Parent and child, though separated by a mighty ocean and apparently conflicting emotions, have been co-workers in the great cause of perfecting and strengthening liberal government. How glorious would it be if some day we may be fortunate enough to establish a Congress of the United States of Japan and America, which shall deal with the questions of commerce, of war and of peace between us and the rest of the world! How grand would it be if some day we may be civilized enough to make out of Japan and America monitors for the peace of the world! Although we can safely predict that before the grand and glorious idea be realized we will have many seasons of war and peace, prosperity and famine!

Let the people of Japan and the United States work shoulder to shoulder in an unselfish interest for human liberty and progress—the eternal principles of justice and philanthropy—recognizing the rights of all according to the highest ideals of Christianity and ideals of the two nations. May the Stars and Stripes and the Banners of the Rising Sun float side by side in mutual endearment, emblems of peace and prosperity, justice, and the greatest amount of true liberty to mankind.

Life of Japan is illustrated throughout with characteristic Japanese designs of decorative character. There is a frontispiece of the author, 300 pages, illuminated cloth cover. Price $3, by mail 25 cents extra. The Baker & Taylor Co., New York, publishers.

The Sight-Singing Classes

THE first of the series of Sight-Singing Classes for vocal tuition by mail, under the care of that well-known and remarkably successful teacher, Mme. Newman, opens shortly. Other classes will follow in succession, the membership of each class averaging 200 students. This series is arranged specially for readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and their friends and affords an excellent opportunity for musical training and voice cultivation. Any one, either with or without previous musical training, is eligible to these classes. The course is conducted exclusively by mail and the student is led, through easy stages and by the very simplest of modern vocal methods, to the point where he or she can sing from the printed score at sight without difficulty or hesitation.

This is an opportunity for all ages, young people or grown-ups all studying the same musical lessons in the quietude of their own homes. "Parents should know not only how to awaken the musical instinct in their children," says Mme. Newman, "but also how to develop it. If musical preparation has been denied in earlier years, it can now be remedied at moderate cost while the children in the household reap not alone the benefits of their own study, but also that of father or mother. Children learn readily and retain what they learn. But as they require more assistance and explanation than their seniors, the parent should be in a position to give both. My method is exceedingly simple and can be readily learned by any one who will give it proper attention and conscientious study, as many hundreds of pupils whom I have taught are ready to testify. I aim to make every papil able to sing correctly from the music sheet, without the aid of an instrument to first play the melody, or the help of some other person to sing it over for them. All who desire to join should write to me care of the Musical Department, CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

eh representatives as Mr. Tower raise ly the respect of foreigners for our rnment and country.

A few years ago, the person stricken with blindness was completely cut off from the activities and enjoyments of everyday life. Then schools for their special instruction were started; books and magazines published in raised type, and many industries inaugurated in which they could earn a living. To find a blind man fighting successfully in the arena of American politics is, however, something that may be considered absolutely new. In the new state of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, they have elected to the United States Senate Hon. Thomas P. Gore, a man who has been blind since childhood. Of course, much of the credit for Mr. Gore's success must be given to his faithful wife, who managed the details of his campaign, and went with him to his meetings. Mr. Gore has much ability as a speaker, and will, without doubt, make his mark in the Senate.

Progress at Tuskegee

OVER six thousand colored men and women, who have been students at the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, are now at work in various parts of the South. All of these are not graduates, but they were students long enough to catch the true Tuskegee spirit, the idea of the dignity of labor. The graduates are the leaven of their race in every school-room where they are found, on the farms or in the home. At least eight institutions similar to Tuskegee, but of course smaller, have been founded by graduates in various States, and are doing excellent work. The graduates, after they are established, endeavor to aid the school in every possible way. Their gifts of money form no small part of the year's donations. A member of the faculty spends much of his time in keeping in touch with the graduates, and advising with them in regard to the best means of raising the moral and material standards of the colored people in their communities.

Booker T. Washington, the principal, in his last report says: "The constant and urgent demands that reach us from all sections of the country for men and women trained at the Tuskegee Institute is proof of the value placed on our work by the general public. It is a conservative statement to say that we cannot supply even one-half of the requests that come to us. Practically every student who finishes any one of our courses is engaged before he graduates. This wide-spread demand for men and women who have received our training, is responsible, in part, I fear, for the large number of students who leave us before finishing the full course."

In addition to its regular work, the Institute has many race interests. There is the National Negro Conference, the Negro Business League, with over four hundred branches, and the Colored Department of the Alabama State Fair. The number of students at the Institute last year was one thousand five hundred and ninety-eight. They came from thirty-six States and twenty-one foreign countries.

Charleston's Gospel Mission

THE Star Gospel Mission of Charleston, S. C., conducted by Mr. O. B. Duzan in what was formerly the Star Theatre, has done a successful work in many directions in the little more than three years of its existence. Its main object has been to bring souls to Jesus Christ. Hundreds have professed conversion at the meetings which are held every night. A large proportion are proving the reality of their profession by a consistent Christian life. The mission has been extremely successful in jail meetings, which are conducted by one of its workers, Marion G. Westendorff. A unique feature is the wagon services, conducted every Sunday evening on King and Hasell Streets. These meetings draw large crowds, who follow and watch the services with reverent attention.

An Australian Visitor's Impressions

ONE of the most interesting personalities who have recently visited America is Mr. J. J. Virgo, general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of Sydney, Australia. Although comparatively a young man, Mr. Virgo has taken a prominent part in Y. M. C. A. work in Australia for twenty years. He is at present making a tour of the world, and in the course of it is spending three or four months in America, inspecting Y. M. C. A.'s, and delivering addresses in various cities.

At the coming International Y. M. C. A. Convention at Washington, D. C., Mr. Virgo will take a prominent part. He has been chosen director of music at the Secretary J. J. Virgo

Convention. During the campaign of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander in Australia five years ago, Mr. Virgo was one of the secretaries of Melbourne Mission, and was one of the most active supporters of their work throughout the Commonwealth.

When I asked Mr. Virgo regarding his mission in America, he said: "The development of Y. M. C. A. work has been so great in the past twenty years that it was deemed wise for me to make a tour of investigation in the United States and Canada, and adopt what was best for our work in Australia.

"I shall be in America three months. Representatives will gather at the Washington Convention from all parts of the world. It is to be the largest convention in the history of the Association management. At least 2,500 delegates are expected, and plans are in progress for a simultaneous mission throughout the city."

"What has been your connection with Y. M. C. A. work in Australia?" he was asked.

"My connection has extended over twenty-one years. For fourteen years I was general secretary at Adelaide, and for two years supervising secretary. For the past five years I have been secretary at Sydney, the most important city of the Commonwealth. It has a population of nearly 600,000 people. Religious work has been a strong feature of the Association programme throughout Australia.

"A great many believe the Commonwealth is on the eve of a great revival, and in every city there are bands of praying men, meeting for the purpose of bringing that about. The permanent results through the efforts of the visiting evangelists have been excellent. Where this has not been the case the cause has been the old defect of failing to follow up the work properly.

"Unquestionably there are permanent results from the Torrey-Alexander campaign of five years ago. There are many evidences in every city which they visited of great good resulting from their labors. I am in a position to state this very definitely, as through the liberality of my board I had frequent opportunity of visiting every city in the Association's interest, and the changed lives of the men whom I knew when unsaved is the basis of my testimony. In Melbourne this is particularly the case. You will remember that their visit was at the time of the Simultaneous Mission of which I was a secretary. For weeks before that Mission began 116,700 different persons met for prayer, and you can well understand that permanent results were bound to come. In every case where there was a systematic following up of the converts of their missions large additions to the churches resulted.

"One of the strong features of the work of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander was the new light shed on Gospel hymn singing. Mr. Alexander won the hearts of the people immediately, and it was no unusual thing to hear the songs that he introduced sung in every part of the cities they visited. The success Mr. Alexander achieved as a Gospel singer and song leader in our country can best be shown by the fact that during his recent visit to Melbourne he drew an audience of 12,000 people at the Exhibition Building with very little announcement of the service. He attracted an almost equal number when he conducted a meeting in the town hall of Sydney, although only about 5,000 persons could be admitted to the building. At each city a strong invitation was given to Mr. Alexander to return to Australia and conduct an extended campaign, and we are hoping that this will be accomplished within the next twelve months.

"The thing that has struck me most forcibly since I arrived in America is the strong desire on the part of the real Christian community for a revival both in the Church and out.

"I was delighted to discover that religious work is the foremost feature of the Y. M. C. A. movement in America and that Bible study is receiving a prominent place in the Association. The entire condition of Y. M. C. A. work in America far surpasses my expectations, both in its material and spiritual aspect."

GEORGE T. B. DAVIS.

Shall Not Inherit the Kingdom

I. COR. 6: 9

THERE is no man in any Christian nation
Who honestly can say,
Of heavenly life I have no expectation
When I shall pass away.

We all anticipate the life immortal
When earthly life is o'er;
We know that we must pass that solemn portal
Death closes evermore.

But will it be the same to all the living,
When we shall come to die?
And are those mansions that the Lord is giving,
For all to occupy?

The life beyond the grave that we are seeking,
Is life the Saviour gives; [speaking,
The mansions there of which the Lord was
Are where the Father lives.

And if on earth we serve the King Eternal
With loyal, filial love,
We spend eternity in realms supernal—
The Father's house above.

Do men who only use God's name profanely
Bow down before their Lord?
Are those who disregard his laws so plainly
Prepared to meet their God?

Van Camp's
BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
PORK AND BEANS

The Care and Skill in the Van Camp Kitchen

You and every other modern housewife would smile approval if you could go through the Van Camp Kitchen and see just how much care and skill is devoted to the making of Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce.

And afterwards you would better understand why Van Camp's are so distinctly superior—so notably delicious and wholesome that you and your sister housewives have for years called them Best. The first impression of the Van Camp kitchen is of Cleanliness and Purity. The floors, the wares, the furnishings, and the utensils are immaculate—the air is always kept fresh and pure—everything is neat and clean and healthful. In such ideal surroundings Van Camp's are made, and on a par therewith are the methods of making. Each article is handled in such a way as to preserve all its natural purity, while the use of modern methods of sterilization makes Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce far better, cleaner and more healthful than the best beans, tomatoes and pork you can buy at the market. The entire process is a perfect combination of neatness and "know-how."

For instance, the snowy beans—best quality of the best varieties—are carefully picked over by hand, and washed three times in running water. Then they are cooked just enough—no bursted skins—no mushiness—but plump, whole beans, as perfect in form as before they went into the kettle. It's the same with every other step in the making of Van Camp's—same neatness, same care, same "know-how."

That's why Van Camp's are so pre-eminently pure, wholesome and good, with just the right proportion of delicious tomato sauce to give the piquant tang, and just enough tender pork to give the toothsome richness.

Van Camp's are easy to serve—meet any meal-time emergency—and they do have such an appetizing taste that there's always a call for more.

Keep your supply of Van Camp's replenished. That's the way to be on the safe side.

An Increase of over 25% in Dividends To Policy Holders

The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York has paid more in dividends to policy holders than any other company in the world. Since organization it has returned in dividends over $118,000,000. As a result chiefly of increased earnings and decreased expenses the annual dividends to policy holders this year, on policies issued in 1905, will be 25% to 30% more than in 1906.

The Mutual Life Insurance Company

feels sure its policy-holders will be pleased with this great reduction in cost. The news may be doubly welcome now when increased cost in other lines seems everywhere the order of the day. If you have others for whose continued care you are concerned, you should learn for yourself how and how cheaply it can be guaranteed by the staunchest life insurance company in the world.

The Time to Act is NOW.

Fighting Anæmia in Porto Rico

THE new Presbyterian Hospital is located on the seashore at Santurce, a suburb of San Juan, Porto Rico, and is one of the atures of mission work on that island. he first buildings were ready for occuncy in February, 1903, and since that ge two additional buildings have been ected, making five in all, namely, the lministration building, dispensary, Enavor building, the nurses' home and tchen.

Administration and Nurses' Buildings

All are connected by broad piazzas, and e refreshing breezes from the sea help bring life and health to the patients o are there for treatment.

Porto Rico is densely populated, but nety per cent. of the people are ill with rto Rican anæmia—a deficiency of red rpuscles in the blood. During the Spano-American war the American doctors scovered a specific for this prevalent sease; but there are too few good phyians and nurses on the island, and st of the people are so poor and so illiterate that treatment in their shacks is unsatisfactory.

There is also great need for surgical work, and the Presbyterian Hospital holds first place among the hospitals of the island. Some remarkable operations have been performed there. They are able to take a few pay patients, but most of the forty-eight patients accommodated are too poor to pay anything. The dispensary is open each day from nine to twelve o'clock, and people come for miles, in all sort of conveyances and on foot, that they may have the benefit of treatment. The clinic is always opened with Scripture reading and prayer in Spanish. Daily service is also held in the wards.

Miss Jennie Ordway, formerly in charge of the school at Mayaguez, is the superintendent, and Dr. E. Raymond Hildreth is in charge of the medical work. An Advisory Board, consisting of Dr. Grace Atkins Holmes, Dr. Ordonez, and Dr. W. D. Stokes, render valuable assistance. The training class for nurses is a power for good, as young Porto Rican women are given a thorough up-to-date training, fitting them to nurse among their own people.

The hospital is supported by pledges and voluntary contributions from societies and individuals; $120 supports a bed in Endeavor Building for a year; $10 for a month. The Junior Christian Endeavor Societies give their money for the children's ward, but funds are always needed for equipment, repairs, painting and surgical appliances, as well as for the salaries of worker, and the support of free beds.

oad. When I talk about the width of e walls, I think there is a hidden meanIf some one should say, "Why are se walls thick?" most would answer, o give them strength." That is true. t I do not believe that is the true aning. Those walls of the ancient ies were used for the most pleasurable purposes. Upon the tops of their y walls, the old Babylonish inhabits used to drive. There the citizens most of the Eastern cities used to ild many of their houses. Do you not member how Rahab had her house ilt upon the top of a city wall, where Hebrew spies visited her? And re upon the hot summer evenings, the ple used to gather upon the city walls catch the cool breezes from the mountns: Upon the city walls those who re expecting their friends to come to it them would assemble and watch the proaching cavalcades. Thus, when I nk of the broad walls of heaven, I ays think of them as crowded with dear ones. There they are, watching l waiting. Every little while, methinks an hear some of them say, "Do you him coming? Do you see my boy? you see my brother? Do you see my sband, or wife, or sister? It is surely e for them to be coming along. Oh, have waited for them so long; do think we are waiting in vain?" Oh, broad walls of heaven! The crowded lls of heaven! Oh, the multitudes of ir ones who are to-day upon the walls watching and waiting for our arrival. ile the multitudes of our dear ones watching for us from the broad walls heaven, every one of the twelve gates pearl is standing wide open. When sed to think about these twelve gates pearl, I always thought of the angelic tchmen closing them at nightfall. t St. John in his apocalypse declares re is no darkness in heaven. He also tinctly affirms, "The gates of it shall be shut at all, for there shall be no ht there." What does this mean? y, it means that God is keeping the rly gates wide open for all to enter who will. He is keeping those gates open now. Are we prepared to enter them?

SAFEGUARDING THE IMMIGRANT

WHEN the immigrants land from the barges at Ellis Island they are put through a moral as well as a physical examination. Of course, the results are not so satisfactory as in the first examination. The questioners must depend to a great extent on the answers of those interrogated, and with little corroborative evidence. Those convicted of crime in their own country must go back to their starting point; but only, in most cases, to try again to reach the promised land that lies just up the Narrows of New York harbor.

A Converted Anarchist

When the immigrants leave the detention buildings they are met by numbers of Christian missionaries, who endeavor to impress on the new arrivals that this is a God-fearing country. They give them Testaments printed in their own tongue, and also do much practical work in preventing the immigrants from falling into the greedy hands of the "land sharks" who regard the new arrivals as their own peculiar prey. Recently a missionary named Lutzing found a young Russian anarchist who had managed to get by the inspectors at Ellis Island. He took him into his own home. He was invited to church and the example of Christian lives made itself felt. He was asked, at last, to choose between Christ and anarchy. He went to his room to pray. When he came out he had chosen the former and was a changed man.

The missionary got work for him and now the young Russian is endeavoring to get his fellow workmen to follow his example. This is only one of several similar incidents at Ellis Island. G. N. T.

Prison Gate Incidents

THE Prison Gate Mission of the Salvation Army is no longer an experiment. It was THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that helped to turn toward us this work, just at that time needing special oversight. There is something about the army itself, both in its spirit and methods and organization, which particularly fits it to deal with problems of this character.

The first man who came into my office at No. 120-124 West Fourteenth Street, after I had reached New York, was on parole. He wished me to help him to take a step contrary to parole regulation, and when I found it impossible to grant his request, the man grew indignant, and with language not to be quoted, started away. I detected already the odor of strong drink, and in a few brotherly words urged him to "let it alone." Strange to say, this little act of interest moved the man almost to tears. He expressed his appreciation and thanks, and after these days have passed, has written to say that he left us determined never to touch strong drink again, and is now anxious to find his way back to an honest life.

"Will you come and see me?" I said to a man as he passed out of my office. To my surprise I saw his eyes fill with tears. At once he assured me that he had no one else who had given him such an invitation, and he would regard it as a great privilege. Two weeks ago he had left prison, after spending many years there for repeated offenses; but he had at last awakened to the fact that sin even here brings its own punishment.

"I know where I might go and join a gang of crooks," he said, "but I don't want to turn toward them. My desire now is to get honest employment and live a different life."

He went on to tell how that from early childhood he had been trained in vice, and had known nothing else during the past years.

A number of men have come to us recently with evident honesty of purpose, some of them too timid to face the great city alone again, and anxious to find any kind of honorable employment where they might protect themselves from temptations. As a beginning, the Department provided nearly 300 situations for men released from prison last year, besides a large number who were given temporary assistance till they could secure employment. A similar work has been going forward in Chicago, under Brigadier McMillan.

Prisons around New York City are regularly visited by a number of our officers and workers. Men and women, shut away from the outer world, are prepared to listen to appeals to forsake sin, as they would not listen were they surrounded by godless companions, and the opportunity to indulge in all kinds of evil.

Every morning, as the boat from Blackwell's Island brings its motley crew of women as well as men from the prisons on the Island, Miss Marie Peterson, a Salvation worker, stands ready to welcome any woman who desires to live a new life. Some are glad to go to our Rescue Home, and others are anxious to secure some honest employment. The work is steadily growing.

A father is now in prison. The wife is earning bread for herself and her children, washing dishes from 7 o'clock in the evening till 7 o'clock in the morning in a New York restaurant, while a neighbor's boy sleeps with her little ones, who are more easily managed at night than during the day. When we gave her $6 to help pay the rent that was due for two little rooms in which she lives, the woman's gratitude knew no bounds. "I can get on splendidly now," she said, yet neither of her rooms has a stove, and the winter is near at hand. Surely this poor creature is worth helping and there are thousands like her, the innocent suffering for the guilty. It is our privilege to extend a helping hand in such cases, and we will gladly welcome any who desire to assist us in the work among the prisoners and the prisoners' wives and little children. Called Higher

S. E. Rorabaugh, of Perry Shore, Pa., an aged Christian and long-time reader of this paper, died recently. He was a member of the Lutheran Church and had been more or less of an invalid for several years past.

Hiram W. Carter, M.D., of Cuyahoga Falls, O., entered into rest August 25, aged sixty-six. For over half a century he had walked with God, being a devoted and active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Through many months of intense suffering he murmured not, but calmly waited the summons home.

Mrs. Hermon Hoag, of Greene, N. Y., passed away recently, in her seventy-third year. Her life was a true and beautiful example of discipleship with Christ. She was a constant reader of the Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She united with the Baptist Church in her childhood and her whole life was spent with blessed assurance and promise for hope of eternal life.

Mrs. James A. Ellsworth, of Chester, Mass., who lately passed away, was a most earnest Christian. For many weeks she had been a great sufferer. Her faith was most precious to her during those long days of suffering, and she would often say, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in his likeness." She was a reader of this journal for many years.

TROUBLE FROM COFFEE

People Beginning to Learn About the Drug

"Coffee treated me so badly that I want to tell people about it, and if you can use my letter I will be glad.

"I am forty-five years old and have drank coffee all my life. I have felt bad for years and did not know what ailed me. Sometimes I would have to press my hand against my heart, I would be in such pain and I got so I could hardly do my work. My head would feel heavy and dizzy, and many a time I got so blind I just had to drop down or else I would have fallen.

"I felt bad all over. My feet would swell and hurt me. A friend of mine asked me to try Postum and stop drinking coffee. I tried the Postum, but it was some days before I got hold of the right way to make it, My heart disease and dropsy disappeared and I got entirely well.

"There is much in making it. It has to be boiled longer than ordinary coffee, but when I got it made good, it was fine, and now I wouldn't have coffee in my house at all. I am sure that Postum saved my life, and I am now perfectly well. I send you the names of about twenty people that have been helped by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee."

Greed for Gold*

F all Scripture lessons, the one that concerns this age more than others his: that the greed for gold can never satisfied and is deadly to spiritual . It is no new thing in the world. story tells us that no period has been e from it, and that in all times n under its influence have committed nes and have struggled with one ther to the death. Some have con- ded that the greed for gold has mpted men to labor and research ich have tended to the growth and bet- ment of the world. It may be so; it uld be strange if its power had alto- her tended to evil; but to produce d it has to be merely an ingredient character and must be joined with nents better than itself. The desire wealth was one of the elements that t Columbus and his men on the ven- esome journey across the Atlantic; that motive was not the sole, nor n the chief incentive to the brave coverer. It mars all it touches, so t it is not uncommon to find that at artists, inventors and statesmen comparatively poor. Their devotion to their art or science, and if wealth nes, it comes as an incident, not as the ef object of effort.

Christ's condemnation of the greed for d is contemptuous. The man who kes it his chief concern he says is a l. The common idea of the man that ks and gains wealth is that he is a e man. There is a very plain reason this opinion. We see so much of the sery of poverty, of its privations, its rdships, that we dread it and have a pect for the man who struggles to id it. That, however, is a very dif- ent thing from the course Christ demned. His denunciation was for man who sought wealth for its own e, who sought it with avidity to hoard ond his own wants. Our duty to rselves, to our family and to the com- nity demands industry and thrift. It a shame for any one to become de- ndent, to leave his wife and daughters earn a livelihood by hard toil. There uld be an earnest endeavor to win a mpetence; it is when that is done and desire for gold continues with in- ased ferocity that the evil appears. hen a man seeks wealth with such lor that, though he has sufficient for present and prospective wants, he is dy to sacrifice principle to gain it, n his folly is evident. His principles, honor, his character are abiding, ile his gold is a mere accumulation ich is useful for this world only.

The World Religion*

IT is difficult for us in this day to realize the shock that was felt by the young Christian Church, when the news came that Peter had preached the Gospel to Gentiles. The spirit of exclusiveness had eaten into the Jewish mind and had not been expelled by the new faith. Christ had warned his people that the old garment could not be mended with the new cloth, but they did not understand. Gentiles were outsiders to them, barbarians, inferior races, not to be mentioned in the same breath with the chosen people of God. It was inconceivable that the privileges granted to them should be offered to the Gentiles.

Probably Peter would have refused to comply with the request of Cornelius if he had not had that vision of the unclean animals before the men came. He said, "God hath shown me that I should not call any man common or unclean." As a commentator says, "It takes God to show a prejudiced man that." And after Peter had learned the lesson and acted upon it, he had to justify himself to his brethren. The fact that the Holy Spirit descended on Cornelius and his friends was sufficient proof that Peter's conduct was approved in heaven. But still there was reluctance to treat the Gentiles on terms of equality. Paul was harassed all his life by the criticisms leveled at his converts. The conservative Jews demanded that Gentile Christians become Jewish proselytes, that they undergo the Jewish rite and observe the ceremonial and dietary laws, before they would recognize them as brethren. It was necessary for Paul to leave his work and go to Jerusalem and plead with a council of the church before full liberty was granted to the Gentile Christians.

Chrstianity would have become a mere Jewish sect, like the Pharisees, but for this vigorous resistance at the beginning. The effort to put bonds on the converts was persistent, and the same spirit is active to the present time. There are people now who urge us to adopt Jewish customs and would have us observe Jewish laws. It is only a century ago that eminent divines opposed the preaching of Christianity to the heathen, and yielded reluctantly before the enthusiasm of the pioneers of missions. But as the apostle said, "The word of God is not bound." The stone cut out of the mountain without hands is yet to be spread through the earth. Christianity is a world religion, with principles adapted to all races and a heart large enough to contain the whole world. The missionary can go with confidence to the most benighted people, sure that his Gospel will meet their need and save their souls.

'Every man gets a free drink to-day," senator replied.

The drink was ordered and quickly lowed the route over which at least dozen other drinks had traveled since rning.

'Show him around, senator," Lee re- ested, as another customer came up to bar. They walked slowly through place looking at everything with eful scrutiny. Presently they were back the bar talking with the proprietor.

'Burns and I have run saloons in ar Lake for twenty years," Marvin s saying. "We've had all the trade. e fact is he was getting so old and ble and cranky that he was losing siness. Of course I couldn't complain, I was getting his customers. He'll better in the grocery, where his wife d daughter can tend to things. He nted to put the girl in here tending r. Thought it would be a great at- ction; but the old woman made such fuss over it that he couldn't do it. I n't say as I'd like to see a girl in a ace like that; but you bet if I said for her to do it she'd do it. I don't want no woman interfering with my business.

"As I say, Burns and I got on to- gether all right, and I don't see no rea- son why you and I can't do the same. You've got a good layout, and will do a good business."

Lee had expected to meet with opposi- tion from the keeper of "Marvin's Place," and was pleased at this tender of friendship. He hastened to recipro- cate the good feeling.

"There ain't a bit of use in our doing anything else," Marvin emphasized. You can come to my place and get anything I've got at any time. We'll stand to- gether and help each other." And the matter was agreed to while the senator grinned his approval.

Affairs at the Golden Rule Saloon moved on without event for some weeks. The place was popular and Lee was more than satisfied with the profits. He felt amply repaid for the large expense for refitting the place.

TAKE THEM OUT

Or Feed Them Food They Can Study On

When a student begins to break down from lack of the right kind of food, there are only two things to do—either take him out of school or feed him properly on food that will rebuild the brain and nerve cells. That food is Grape-Nuts.

A boy writes from Jamestown, N. Y., saying: "A short time ago I got into a bad condition from overstudy, but mother having heard about Grape-Nuts food began to feed me on it. It satisfied my hunger better than any other food, and the results were marvelous. I got fleshy like a good fellow. My usual morning headaches disappeared, and I found I could study for a long period without feeling the effects of it.

"My face was pale and thin, but is now round and has considerable color. After I had been using Grape-Nuts for about two months I felt like a new boy altogether. I have gained greatly in strength as well as flesh, and it is a pleasure to study now that I am not bothered with my head. I passed all of my examinations with a reasonably good percentage, extra good in some of them, and it is Grape-Nuts that has saved me from a year's delay in entering college.

"Father and mother have both been improved by the use of Grape-Nuts. Mother was troubled with sleepless nights, and got very thin, and looked careworn. She has gained her normal strength and looks and sleeps well nights." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville" in pkgs.

Pain

PAIN passed my door:
'Twas in the time of singing of the bird;
The blossom-time, the morning of my day;
And all life's road, a path of promise, lay
Sweet, sweet with fragrant flowers
And budding leaves, and sunlit, song-filled hours:
It wound the sunward way;
When Pain's sad step I heard
Passing my door.

Pain turned his pace.
He cast a glance in at my casement bright,
And his dark shadow fell athwart the floor,
It barred the sunward path, sunlit no more.
My heart was faint with fear
To know the awful dread so near, so near;
I locked and barred the door
With trembling hands, and white
And fear-struck face

Pain entered in:
Though double-barred the door, the presence dark
Stepped o'er the threshold of my life. The light
Waned with his coming, darkened into night.
Pain changed my song to tears;
Brought, in one flood, all sorrow's late arrears;
To ashes turned delight,
And seared me with his mark,
Without, within.

Pain went his way.
'Twas after many days, at last, at last
Pain kissed me on the lips and went his way;
But in that kiss a benediction lay
Of sweetness, Oh, far more
Than that of all the happy years of yore.
And on the sunward way
I found, where pain had passed
The key to joy.

Joshua's Farewell

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IN his old age, Joshua ceased to be a warrior; the Lord made him a surveyor of the inheritance which he had given to his people, and called him to divide the land by lot; and, although many of their enemies remained in it, the tribes of Israel entered upon their inheritance. Now Joshua became a preacher, thus bringing forth "fruit in old age" (Psalm 92: 14). The theme of his discourse when he gathered all Israel, their elders, their heads, their judges, and their officers as his audience, was the faithfulness of God, and their responsibility to obey and to trust him. He appealed to them as witnesses to what the Lord had done for them, to the fact that their God was he who had fought for them.

No credit did Joshua take to himself because he had been made the instrument of God in effecting the great work of subduing the enemies of Israel and taking possession of the land of Canaan, for Joshua saw not himself, but God. He reminded them how he had divided the land to them by lot, but told them how God himself would expel the inhabitants who yet remained in their inheritance; but that, therefore—i. e., in order to this—they must keep and do what was written in the law of Moses, they must keep free from idolatry, they must cleave to the Lord their God.

How exactly is this a type of our position! We are called to inherit all the fulness of God (Eph. 3: 19), yet mighty foes dispute our inheritance. Our only power against them is to count on the immutable promise of our God, who fighteth for us, in the strong confidence that God is now, and at all times, on our side. He has not to be brought round to help us by our striving, struggling, and making efforts of our own, after the manner of the heathen, whose only idea is to force their false gods to help them by some mighty earnestness on their own part; their real reliance being on those efforts.

Joshua's personal testimony, after a life of one hundred and ten years, is most precious. "And, behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth; and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof." Little of the Word of God was then written; but how precious is the witness of this old believer, that God could not and would not alter the thing that was gone out of his mouth! And now that he who spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets hath in these last days (these days of an open Bible) spoken unto us by his Son (Heb. 1: 1, 2), how much more are we bound to believe to the full, and put to the proof, the Word of the living God!

Joshua argued that, as all good things were come upon the Lord's people according to his word of promise, so would all evil things surely come upon them if they transgressed against the Lord. He then formally renewed the covenant with Israel. He held what would be called in our days a solemn consecration meeting. He gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for their elders, heads and officers, "and they presented themselves before God." Then he delivered to them a direct message from God. On the ground of God's faithfulness, Joshua appealed to his people to make a solemn consecration: "Now, therefore, fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth." But this involved sacrifice: "Put away the gods which your fathers served . . . and serve ye the Lord." There is no real consecration without a distinct putting away. Consecration is from and to—from the world, from sin—from the power of friends and relations who would hinder us—above all, from self—to God.

Lots of Fun with an Edison Phonograph

This wonderful instrument has been termed, and rightly, too, the "king of entertainers". There is absolutely no one old or young who is not amused and delighted by this greatest invention of the "WIZARD OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY." As Mr. Edison has well said, no American Home should be without a phonograph.

Look at the happy home scene depicted above. At this very moment there are thousands of homes in the United States where you might find just such scenes as these.

The baby, as you see, is filled with delight at the deep, human sounds which come from the big horn of the phonograph. Grandpa is as much pleased as the baby. Every member of the family is happy. Don't you want to bring just such scenes into your own home?

There are 1,500 Edison Records. Think of it: Fifteen hundred different "acts" which may be given on an Edison. The greatest pianist in the world doesn't know 1,500 pieces.

Think of the many delightful programmes you could make up. Let us suppose you want to have a dance. Place the phonograph in one end of the room, take up the carpets or rugs and begin. You don't have to wait for any fiddler and you don't have to pay him $3 for his work either.

Here is an illustration of what you may do when your friends call: One likes a comic song. Out comes a record filled by one of the best known minstrels of the day. Everybody applauds, and while the hand clapping is going on you slip in a Sousa march and watch the listeners straighten up. Another asks for a dialog between two "cullud gem'n," some one else wants one of Melba's selections, and still another wants a ringing "Coban" tune. The applause becomes deafening and you are the hero or the heroine of the whole neighborhood. Thus can the concerts go on night after night. Any boy or girl can learn in five minutes how to play the Edison phonograph.

And on Sunday you may have sacred music of the very finest quality.

And don't forget that you may secure records of every member of the family. These will keep for years and years, and after the dear ones have departed their voices will be with you still. Let Grandpa talk into the horn and then listen to his exact words as they come from the phonograph a moment later. Let the baby talk into the horn and the same miracle is repeated.

THE MEETING-PLACE OF THE FIRST FILIPINO CONGRESS IN MANILA

Questions and Answers

O. F., Louisville, Ky. In what month does Lammas Day come? What is meant by the term?

It is the first day of August. It is one of the English "quarter days." These are days when bills are rendered, instead of at the end of the month, as is the custom in America.

M. O. B., Paterson, N. J. Is it a duty or privilege to attend religious services?

It is both a duty and a privilege, and he who neglects it misses a great blessing and much of the enjoyment of spiritual life and growth. The Psalmist tells us that a day in God's courts is "better than a thousand." We are frequently reminded in the Scriptures that it is a duty. See Heb. 10: 25; Psalm 111: 1; Matt. 18: 20, and other passages.

W. M. L., Zeeland, Mich. What is the origin of the term "Indian summer"?

"Indian summer" (which is synonymous with "St. Martin's summer" in Europe) is so called from the custom of the Indians in availing themselves of that season to harvest their corn. Their old tradition says: "We always have a second summer of nine days just before winter sets in."

E. L. H., Englewood, Ill. A tramp came to a merchant and got a pair of shoes at $4, and gave the merchant a $10 bill. The merchant did not have change, so he went to the postmaster and got the $10 bill changed, and gave the tramp $6 and the shoes. Then the postmaster told the merchant the $10 bill was counterfeit, and he must have his good money back; so the merchant gave him $10 in good money. How much money did the merchant lose besides the shoes?

He paid out $6 to the tramp, and $10 to reimburse the merchant, or $16 in cash besides the shoes.

Mrs. G. L. C., Brooksville, Miss. Where in the Bible does it tell that Rahab married an Israelite named Salmon?

See Ruth 4: 21 and Matt. 1: 5.

Referring to a recent article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, A. R. H., Knoxville, Tenn., writes:

Referring to the article in your issue of September 25, "The Southern Temperance Movement," I note you say:

"Knoxville, Tenn., is a Prohibition city. In the days of the saloon it had a population of 35,000, and the criminal costs were $50,074.76. Now it has a population of 50,000, and the criminal costs have gone down to $2,076.21, a sufficient answer to those who put forward the absurd claim that a city needs the saloon to help pay taxes and make it prosperous."

I have been living here for fifteen years, and the town has always been wet, and will be wet until the first of the coming November. After that time it will be dry. It is true that several saloons have ceased to do business during the past month, but the majority of them are still open, and will remain so until November 1, as above stated. The population of this place is about 60,000, and as it has never in the past been a dry town I am unable to understand how the statement can be made that "in the days of the saloon it had a population of 35,000, and that now (meaning a long while after the saloons have gone) it has increased to 50,000, and "that criminal costs have decreased from $50,074.76 to $2,076.21." The party who gave you this information seems to know, for he has figured it out to the exact cent.

We took the facts and figures from one of your own city papers, the Knoxville Sentinel, which we suppose has had ample facilities to make itself acquainted with the situation.

J. S. C., Talley, Tenn. Did David give Araunah fifty shekels of silver for his land, as stated in II. Samuel 24: 24, or six hundred shekels of gold, as stated in I. Chron. 21: 25?

The discrepancy has often been pointed out. The probable explanation is in the attitude of the two writers. The writer of Chronicles is believed to have been an officer of the Temple, perhaps a singer. In all his work he goes into the most minute details about the Temple. It evidently engrossed his life and filled his thoughts. The Temple, as you know, was built on this ground of Araunah's. David probably purchased the threshing floor, as Samuel says, for fifty shekels; but afterward deciding that the Temple should be built there, he bought the whole hill, as the chronicler says, for six hundred shekels. The chronicler, with his mind on the Temple, makes the latter payment his record.

M. G. M., Mayflower, Ark. Some teachers here insist that no one can be saved unless he has received what they call the second blessing. Is there any Scripture to support that view?

You are probably mistaken about their teaching. People who hold the necessity of "the second blessing" usually speak of it as a condition of service, of power to win souls and to lead a sanctified life. They hold the Scriptural doctrine that salvation is assured when justification takes place. That is when a man exercises faith in Christ, as Paul told the Philippian jailer (Acts 16: 31). They differ from other Christians only as to the sanctification which follows. They think that sanctification is sudden and instantaneous, while other Christians believe it is a life-long process (See Peter 3: 18 and I. Thess. 5: 23).

Dr. Bentley, Montgomery, Minn. 1. Why did Nicodemus visit Jesus by night? 2. Why is Jesus called the Son of Man?

1. He probably did not wish to identify himself with Jesus at that early period of his ministry. He was a member of the Sanhedrin, the highest council of the nation, and he wanted to know more of Jesus before being regarded as his follower. There may have been other reasons, but the primary reason for his choosing night for the time of his visit was to avoid public notoriety. 2. No explanation of the title is given in the New Testament, but as Jesus himself called himself so, but appears never to have been addressed by that title, he must have had some special reason for it. He may have had such passages as Psalm 8: 4 and Daniel 7: 13 in his mind. The general impression of theologians is that he intended to convey by the title the idea of his being the representative Man, his identity with the human race, the Messiah. If he had openly called himself the Messiah, he would probably have been stoned on the spot. The title Son of Man he may have used to avoid such an abrupt end to his ministry.

Reader, Schodack Landing, N. Y. What is the husband's right in his wife's estate, if she dies intestate, whether she has children or not?

Personal property, including stocks, bonds, cash, money due wife and tangible personal effects: If the wife leaves children, they take two-thirds, the husband one-third. If she leaves no children, the husband takes all; but if he takes the property, he must pay wife's debts. Real estate: The husband has use of this absolutely while he lives. On his death, it goes to wife's heirs, i. e., blood relations. This is the law of New York State.

C. S. M., Clinton, Tenn. Where in the Bible does this Scripture appear, "This world is full of thy wonderful works"?

See Psalms 40: 5; 78: 4; 107, several verses, and 111: 4.

L. W. H., Bloomingburg, O. Is not the direct statement as to backsliders in Heb. 10: 26, a contradiction of the assurance in I. John 2: 1, 2?

There does not appear to us any contradiction. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews simply warns those who sin after conversion that there is no other way of restoration but the one they have trampled under foot; while John goes a step further and reminds them and all others that there is still an Advocate whose power avails for them. They must go back to him and beg him to plead for them; there is no other sacrifice they can make.

R. H. W., Christiania, Norway. Am I or am I not correct in attributing the authorship of these lines to the poet Southey?

> Go, little Book, from this my solitude:
> I cast thee on the waters. Go thy ways.
> And if, as I believe, thy vein be good, etc.

Under what heading and in what edition of the poet's works are they to be found? Add the other lines if possible.

They are the "envoy" or postscript (an archaic sort of send-off formerly affected by poets) to Southey's Lay of the Laureate. You will find them in Appleton's edition and possibly in others also. The remaining lines are:

> The world will find thee after many days.
> Be it with thee according to thy worth:
> Go, little Book! in faith I send thee forth.

H. B. M., Bassett, Neb. Who are the sons of God and the daughters of men referred to in Gen. 6: 2?

All kinds of fanciful interpretations have been given. Many evolutionists believe that the daughters of men were the lower type of being from whom man developed. The orthodox explanation is that they were the descendants of Cain, while those characterized as sons of God were the descendants of Seth.

THE GRAVE OF CAPTAIN COOK

REAR-ADMIRAL VERY, who is in command of the American naval forces at Honolulu, recently sent a party of his sailors to Kealakekua Bay, a distance of 170 miles, to repair the monument that was erected years ago to the memory of Captain Cook of the Royal British Navy. The men made the trip on the tug Iroquois. The men cut down the dense growth of underbrush that had sprung up in the enclosure, repaired the stonework, and reblackened the lettering, which had become much faded. One party was detailed to paint the cannon that held the chains about the shaft. Captain Cook was killed in 1779 by a band of natives under Chief Nooah. The natives had stolen a boat and Captain Cook was endeavoring to hold the chief as a hostage. Cook was struck down before his men could help him. Until the Hawaiian Islands were annexed by the United States, British warships made regular trips to repair the grave of the famous circumnavigator. Now the United States has taken up that duty.

Likes the Standard Bible

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The American Standard Bible which I ordered from you has come to my address in perfect order. I certainly value it very much and heartily endorse your goods as "better than they are advertised."

Pine Beach, Va. J. S. COLBURN.

All As Advertised

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I write to acknowledge the receipt of the "Great Hereafter," also the two volumes of the "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." They came as advertised, in good time and in good condition. I am well pleased with them and will enjoy having them.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE HOME

AMERICA'S OWN PEACE CONGRESS

The Pact Which Will Bind the Central American Republics in Fraternal Bonds

STEPS were recently taken at Washington looking toward an international peace movement which seems destined to prove one of the most important humane projects of the decade. The ection of the globe affected by this latest peace pact—amely, Central America—is, comparatively, of only ıoderate area; but the fact that it has been for a ong time past the scene of widespread and well-nigh ontinuous strife between the States renders the present chievement all the more noteworthy on behalf of tranuillity and good feeling. In view of a certain disappointıent in connection with the outcome of the recent 'eace Conference at The Hague, this promise of perıanent peace in a heretofore turbulent uarter of the globe is particularly ratifying.

As most of our readers are doubtless ware, the territory between the southrn boundary of Mexico and the Isthus of Panama, occupied by five republ:s, has seldom during recent years been holly free from more or less serious isputes between the contiguous States. he situation is often complicated by evolutionary movements, wherein rebels gainst an existing government have ieir base of operations within the oundaries of a supposedly friendly ountry. An example of the extent to hich these quarrels disturbed commerıl, social and political relations in is part of the world was found in the cent conflict to which Salvador, Honıras, Guatemala and Costa Rica were rties, and which was finally settled rough the good offices of the United ates.

These disturbed conditions indicated e sore need of firm foundations for rmanent peace in Central America. ccordingly, President Roosevelt and esident Diaz of Mexico, a few months go, despatched a joint note to the lers of the five republics, inviting them to send repreıntatives to a conference on behalf of perpetual peace, id tendering the services of the American and Mexin executives in a purely friendly and impartial way. All of the Central American Powers accepted the intation of their northern neighbors, and the outcome is found in a recent gathering of Latin-American ıtesmen that was preliminary to another meeting to held a few weeks hence.

The representatives or accredited agents who acted r their respective governments at this significant asmblage were: Señor Don Joaquin Bernardo Calvo, Costa Rica; Señor Don Luis F. Corea, of Nicaragua; . Don Luis Toledo-Herrarte, of Guatemala; Señor Don Federico Mejia, of Salvador, and Dr. Angel Ugarte, of Honduras. Hon. Robert Bacon, Assistant Secretary of State of the United States, and Señor Don José F. Godoy, of Mexico, met with the Central American diplomats and by their counsel aided materially in bringing about a mutual understanding.

As the outcome of this missionary work on behalf of continental harmony, the envoys of the five republics concerned have signed a protocol whereby the nations represented pledge themselves to maintain "peace and good relations among themselves," and respectively assume the obligation not to commit or allow to be committed any act which might disturb their mutual tranquillity. To this end they are pledged to refrain from any armed demonstration on their respective frontiers, and to withdraw their naval forces to their territorial waters. They further agree to submit to the joint arbitration of the President of the United States and the President of Mexico any question arising between them that cannot be adjusted by the usual diplomatic methods.

"THE PEACEMAKERS"

Señor Godoy, Representative of Mexico Assistant Secretary of State Bacon, United States

As has been stated, the recent action of the envoys at Washington, although it is fraught with the true significance of the whole situation, is, for the sake of official procedure, only preliminary to a more elaborate conference which will be held at the American capital this winter, and which is expected to ratify and amplify the action already taken. To this coming Conference all of the five republics will send plenipotentiaries, who will discuss the steps to be taken and the measures to be adopted, in order to adjust any differences now existing among the various republics. They will also negotiate a formal treaty which shall determine their general relations in future. The United States and Mexico have been invited to send representatives to co-operate by suggestion and advice, in bringing about conditions that will lead to enduring tranquillity.

The principal participants in the coming Conference will be the five statesmen who acted for the quintet of republics in signing the protocol above mentioned. Each of these envoys will, however, have the aid of one or more able advisers of his own people. Señor Calvo of Costa Rica will be assisted by Señor Luis Anderson, Minister of Foreign Affairs. Associated with Dr. Toledo Herrarte will be Señor Juan Barrios, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Guatemala, Antonio Batres Jauregui, and Señor Victor Sanchez Ocana. Dr. Angel Ugarte will have as his co-workers Señor Policarpo Bonilla, former President of the Republic of Honduras, and Señor Constantino Fiallos, Minister of Foreign Affairs. Señor Jose Madriz comes from Nicaragua to lend aid to Señor Corea, and Señor Mejia of Salvador will work in company with two of his countrymen, Señor Salvador Gallegos and Señor Manuel Delgado.

Although each of the republics has the right to as many delegates as she may desire at the coming Conference, each will be entitled to but one vote when ballots are to be cast in the course of the deliberations.

This approaching Conference will not have before it for discussion any question of such moment as those that have arisen at The Hague. But while the participants, with two exceptions, may be classed among the minor powers, their mutual peace and harmony are all important to the welfare and progress of a large section of this hemisphere. Under favorable conditions, the development of the natural resources of the Central American republics within the next generation will be great beyond all precedent; but such development can only be attained through continued peaceful relations and a natural progress that is uninterrupted by disturbances such as have proved the greatest hindrance in the past. With mutual good will toward each other characterizing all their relations, the future of the Central American republics is bright with promise.

TEXT—I. Cor. 13: 13

"The greatest of these is love"

THERE are some things so true that it is impossible to prove them. Some things so exquisitely beautiful that it is impossible to make pictures of them. Some things so great that the heart is able merely to feel of them without thought being competent at all to reach around them. Such things are none the less real to us for all that no description can be made of them, or any last word be said about them. Perhaps we cannot think without language, but I know we can feel without it, and what is truest and most exquisite and greatest borrows nothing from the dictionary or the spelling-book.

It is probably the fact, it is certainly the fact, that in matters of the soul too much effort has been put into trying to phrase the great realities, to doing up large matters in little verbal packages, and making words answer for things. Epigrams and aphorisms amuse the understanding, but they leave the affections cold. They may have the glitter of an icicle, but they have the chill of an icicle, too. There are no smart things said in the Gospel, no attempt to speak words that are final and startling. Lightning fills the air with a hurricane of light; but it is the soft, quiet rain that settles into the furrows and makes the corn grow.

An Undefined Word

Christ was not unphilosophical, but he was not a philosopher. He was not untheological, still he was not a theologian. Things that he talks about he does not define. Mostly they are not definable. Caging a sweet reality is like caging a bird, whose mellowest songs are always those that it renders in the open.

So that, although the tender attitude of the soul specified in our text comes to continuous expression in the message of our Lord, he never undertakes to tell what love is, never confuses the matter by trying to clarify it. St. Paul says that love is the greatest thing in the world and leaves it there. St. John's Epistles are fragrant with delicate references to it, but his Epistles have no glossary, and what the heart feels never need be run in the mould of a definition—never can be, I should say. It is delightful that there are so many great things—love among the rest—that while they are dark to the intellect are all white to the heart—mental problems, but spiritual transparencies, far away as the sun, but as close by and warm as the next sunbeam.

Just because this near-by thing we call love is the central fact of the Gospel, therefore the Gospel admits of being a universal Gospel. Were its central fact something more difficult, something that needed to be explained and that would therefore, in all likelihood, be differently interpreted by different people, then we should have to have a variety of Gospels suited to the various power and quality of men's understanding. But as love needs no explanation, and means the same thing to all men everywhere and always, here and above, therefore one Gospel suffices, and, if properly presented, and suitably lived, the whole world falls within the reach of its influence and becomes amenable to its power.

It is the world's misfortune that love has not been uniformly presented as the Gospel's one imperial feature, the feature as compared with which everything else in it is a distinct secondary. Of course there are other elements gathered around it and associated with it. Christ had a great many things to say and a great many facts to emphasize beside this one fact and law of affection. There are a great many things in our astronomical system beside the sun; but the very fact that we call it the solar system is an expression of the sun's dominant centrality in that system, everything else in it mastered by the sun, warmed by it, brightened and colored by it.

The Chief Ingredient

Quite like that in respect of centrality and dominance is the relation sustained by love to the other ingredients of the Christian system. It is the first point in it upon which to fix our regard, and the point still to be held steadily in view in our survey and estimate of all other points. St. Paul seems to have something of this kind in mind when he speaks of "rightly dividing the word of truth"—presenting truth in a way to preserve its due proportions and relations, putting the emphasis where emphasis belongs, and supreme emphasis upon the superlative point, which he says here is not hope, is not even faith, but is love.

Much mischief and a sad amount of confusion have been occasioned to even the honest hearts of people by having the supreme accent placed now upon one feature of the Lord's story—what we know as the Gospel—and now upon another feature: very much the same confusion as would be wrought in a student's mind by to-day having the sun made the controlling element in our planetary system, and to-morrow reckoning everything from the planet Mars, and day after to-morrow from the planet Jupiter, or Donati's comet.

That would result in the formation of a variety of schools of astronomy, and it is an analogous influence that operates to produce a variety of schools of Christianity, this locating of the centre of gravity of the Christian system at diverse points, instead of all agreeing to find it in this one point authoritatively, and with Scripture unanimity declared for it.

An Appeal to the Heart

The prevalence of such segregating diversity was part humorously and part seriously illustrated by the late Bishop Brooks, when he stated that a Presbyterian does not care how a man behaves if he believes right; that a Unitarian does not care how he believes if he behaves right, and that an Episcopalian does not care how he either believes or behaves if he is only an Episcopalian—a description of the situation which I would not, of course, have quoted, had it not proceeded, as I am informed, from the mouth of a distinguished prelate of the last-named church.

The aptness of the illustration consists only in this: that it suggests in rather a lively manner the way in which the emphasis of men's Christian regards settle at distinct points, making ecclesiastical multiplicity and contrariety a natural and necessary consequence. Any number of men, even though as pronounced in their intellectual activities as St. Paul, and as keen in their discernments, would never have gotten apart and marshaled themselves under a diversity of standards if as clearly as he and St. John, and as the Lord himself, they had recognized, and stood to it and lived by it, that the determinative feature and the imperial quality distinguishing God himself, and distinguishing in the same way every man born of God and a small copy of the original Christ, is love, the uncalculating outgoing of one's heart to the Father above us and the brothers that are all around.

The Gospel in its innermost genius is an appeal to the heart, not to the intellect, not to the will. The world has got to be warmed into righteousness, loved into righteousness, not reasoned into it, not driven into it. Thought that is prosecuted in a cold atmosphere leads to hell a great deal faster than it does to heaven, and so does compulsion applied under the form of menace. We should have a great deal sweeter theology and a great deal profounder theology if we theologized less, and maintained a more sympathetic closeness with the Master who did no arguing and did no fighting, but who cured the sin-sick, not by the medicine of dogmatism, nor by the bitter pill of an impending damnation, letting the wills of men alone, not concerning himself too much with their intelligence or the lack of it, but feeling his way gently and lovingly into that inner and deepest spot which we call the heart, and out of which are all the issues of life.

Beauty Obscured by Fog

I have recently been reading the Gospels over again, and connectedly, with a view to getting as closely as possible to the very mind of Christ, to the methods of his working, to the impulses by which those methods were inspired, and to the purposes which, in it all, he was cherishing; and it is all so wonderfully personal and so startlingly simple! My reading has wrought in me the conviction that, if I am not utterly in error, we have allowed the beautiful territory of Christ's three years of ministry to be so bedimmed and suffused with the mists of antecedent Judaism, and to be so overgrown with the rank foliage of subsequent argumentation of a doctrinal kind, that the scenery proper is almost entirely blotted out, and the real beauty that we need most to see, and in whose charm we need most to have our souls bathed, is buried in the obscurity of fog and dialectics.

The thing in this recent reading of mine that has surprised me again is the very small number of things which Jesus said that strained at all the intelligence of the people he spoke to, and the very small number of things he said that could produce in them any feeling of irritation, feeling that they were being preached at, that they were being sat upon in judgment; everything sweetly consonant with those words that he spoke concerning his own mission to men—"God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world"—and accordingly spending not so much of his time in talking and expatiating as in doing, and in doing those things that served to reveal to men the tender contents of his ow heart, and thus to make an avenue through which th love-warmth that was in him might work a gentl springtime, and then a blossomy summertime in th hearts of every one of those he reached out towar and touched.

We should some of us be better Christians if w spent less of our energy in trying to think the Gospe and more in learning to feel it, and learning to recog nize, with the apostle who wrote our text, that a ounce of holy affection is worth more than a grea many pounds of intellectual accuracy. Hard thinkin about religious things, a keen investigation of the dif ficult problems of Christianity, is doubtless a congenia exercise to those who are competent for it. It is prob ably an interesting experience to listen to the hum o our mental machinery. So it must have been to S Paul, who was a very colossus as a theologian, and Napoleon of doctrinal research. This makes it pecu liarly interesting that it was just such an one as h that writes for us in this Thirteenth of Corinthians tha it is to none of this that is to be accorded the first plac in the schedule of Christian values, that a love is better thing than a thought, and that candidacy fo the heaven of this world or of any other world is t be effected by the tender realization of the heart, n by the rigorous conclusions of the mind.

The Centripetal Force

Herein lies the secret of divergence among Chris tians, and competition, and even antagonism, amon churches. We have not thought too much, perhaps, bu we have thought too much for the amount of our lovin The more two people think the farther, in all likelihoo will they find themselves apart. Thought is a forc but it is a centrifugal force, and even inside of th church has not been held in due check by the cen tripetence of affection. The original church held t gether in the sweet bonds of an unstrained unity t love began to congeal into forms of frigid opinion; the it went to pieces and is to-day quite as much disti guished for its disintegration as for its unity. W talk church unity, and we plan it and organize it, an we gain it not by agreeing to disagree, not by abolish ing the points wherein we differ; but by that sort o heart-approach which is wrought by the possession o the quality of love.

And, as already said, it is because love is the fir fact of all facts in the Gospel of Christ that the Gosp is fitted to be a universal Gospel. All men have heart and love is the same thing to every heart. An idea not the same thing to every mind, but love is the san thing to every heart. A loving smile smiled by a American woman in China does not have to be tran lated into Chinese in order to be understood by Chinaman. A child can perfectly interpret the swee ness in its mother's face long before it can transla into thoughts of its own the words she utters. thought is the soul's prose, love is its music, and y know that music will steal easily into many a spot which words stiffly articulated would be coldly refus admittance.

In the discussion of mission problems it is claim oftentimes that the Gospel, if it is to be carried su cessfully among the cultivated classes of the Orie must be readapted to match the eccentricities of t Eastern mind. If the Gospel is a philosophy, y Between the mind in India and that in the West the is undoubtedly a discrepancy. But it is not to mi that the Gospel makes its primary appeal. In all ma ters of character—and that is the one result that t Gospel is in the world to achieve—a sound thought not a circumstance as compared with and affections are the same the world over. To love Bombay or in Nagasaki is the same as to love here Madison Avenue. In the mental structure of peop in different parts of the world, and even in the sa parts, there are all sorts of varieties; but hearts a alike, and loves, like English gold, pass as coin curre in all kingdoms of the world; and whether Christ a pears in Judea, or were to appear in New York or St. Petersburg or in Canton, the soil he would cul vate would be that which lies deeper in men than an thing out of which germinate their opinions, philos phies, theologies; the soul, namely, where spring a unfold his affections, sympathies, personal tenderness the soil common to all, by which all men become k and susceptible, therefore, to the one love-Gospel of t one world-Redeemer.

Perhaps one reason why we have been a little slow

THE PRESIDENTIAL EXCURSION

Responding to Cheers on Shore

The President's Steamboat

President Roosevelt on the Mississippi

AFTER a brief vacation in the South, President Roosevelt is back in Washington, hard at work in the office building that juts out from the side of the White House. While the trip was taken for health and pleasure, it had more far-reaching results. The President said in one of his speeches "that it was a good thing for the President of the United States to travel, not so much for what he could teach, as for what he could learn."

It looked for a time as if the President would not get the bear he was after, but he secured one during the latter part of his stay at the camp in the cane-brake. Bruin led the hunters on a four-hour chase. Ben Lilley was in charge of the hunt, and was anxious that the hounds should strike a trail. A little after noon the footprints of a bear were seen, and the President got on his horse and followed Lilley through the cane-brake. In places the cane grew so thickly that they had to break down the stalks in order to get through. Several times they caught sight of the bear, only to see it disappear again in the underbrush. Toward evening they came to a small opening. The President got to within seventy yards of the bear and fired as it made another plunge for the cane-brake. That night four hundred pounds of dressed bear meat was hanging up in the "executive" tent, for the inspection of the President's fellow campers, one of whom was Rear Admiral Rixey.

The President, when he came out of the cane-brake, looked as if he had had a happy time, even if his success in hunting has been small. He was bronzed and walked with a stride even more energetic than that usually indulged in by the strenuous chief executive. He had with him the skin of the buck and the pelt of the bear he shot. He passed the night at a near-by plantation. A gentleman, who had a young cub, offered it to Mr. Roosevelt as a gift for his son, Quentin. That active member of the Presidential household has been assiduously collecting a small zoo, and the President was grateful for the offered gift. He, however, felt obliged to decline, as he felt that a live bear in the White House grounds might cause more excitement for visitors than would be good for their nerves.

The President had a busy and enjoyable time at Nashville. He took part in two parades, and made three speeches, and also made a pilgrimage to the Hermitage, the home of Andrew Jackson. He was met at the station by Governor Patterson and the mayor of Nashville. One of the largest parades seen in the State escorted the President to the auditorium.

Forty automobiles took the President and his hosts over the twelve mile road to the Hermitage. On his way he stopped for a few moments at the Peabody Home for Teachers. By the constitution of this school, the President of the United States is ex-officio a member of the Board of Trustees. Over fifteen hundred people were assembled on the campus and broke into the school cheer, as the chancellor pinned on Mr. Roosevelt's coat a rosette of the college colors, while one of the young ladies of the school presented him with a beautiful bouquet of chrysanthemums.

On the ground surrounding the home of "Old Hickory" five thousand people had gathered, most of them from Nashville. The Ladies' Hermitage Association was in charge, and the members took the President through the various rooms that had been occupied by Jackson. The ladies gave the President an artistic cane, made from a piece of hickory that had been cut on the grounds.

That same evening the President's special stopped for a few minutes in Chattanooga. Twenty thousand people tried to get near enough to hear him, and the result was that in the rush many people were carried off their feet and trampled on.

A few hours later and the President and his friends were once more in the Capital City.

allowing to love all the ascendency claimed for it by Christ, and insisted upon by St. Paul in our text, is, that we have not altogether appreciated the wide and rich role that love is qualified to play in our relations to the world above and the world around.

One of the most difficult things that a man has to deal with is his will. By no direct action on his part can he do anything with it himself, and still less can anybody else do anything with it. It is inherently rigid, and yet is at the same time full of possible flexibility. It is like iron, which might be defined as metallic obstinacy, and yet is capable of being reduced to any form that the art of man chooses to bring it to. Will is a thing that it is impossible to subdue by compulsion; but there is nothing in the world that is more susceptible to the treatment of affection. Your response is complete and instantaneous to the slightest wish of one who thoroughly loves you and whom you thoroughly love.

I do not know what will is, and I do not know what love is; but I do know, and we all know, that a loving heart delights to yield to the desire of the one that its love goes out toward; that under such circumstances there is no service that can be rendered that is a reluctant service; no gift that can be bestowed that is not a spontaneous offering, going over into the hands of the recipient all resplendent with the triumphant affection of the heart that is its donor. The very stubbornness of the will, once that will has been subdued by affection, seems to pass over into the affection itself that subdued it, and to become there an impulse of sweet tenacity.

And that is the only kind of yielding, whether as toward man or toward God, that has any value or beauty in it. And love is the only influence that will work that result. It is what fire is to the iron. It is what the sunbeam is to the frost-crystal, softening that crystal into a limpid tear-drop. Once love is there, everything is easy: it is a kind of current, love is, setting out toward God and man; a kind of sweet inundation that seizes from the banks and bears upon its bosom whatever had been lying back, stiff, stark and immovable. The nerve of affection is, then, the only chord strung within us whose vibration is able to break the silence of the soul and to fill its chambers with sweet resonance.

And not only does the love that we cherish work back in this way upon the other impulses of our own soul, so that if we love a friend it is the pleasantest thing in the world to put ourselves at the service of the friend, and if we love God it is no longer a hardship but a delight to do the will of God; but also the love that we cherish tells with working effect upon those out toward whom our love extends.

There is more in this, I am confident, than is ordinarily understood. Without attempting at all to say what love is, it is something certainly a great deal more than mere sentiment. It is not merely one of those graces of the human spirit upon which if one looks, there comes back upon the mind of the beholder a pleasant impression, as when flowers gladden the eye with a beautiful surprise, and work no effect but that of a momentary pleasure—or when pictures stimulate in a transient way the impulses already in us, but without power to convey to us new impulses not already of our possession. Love is certainly more and other than that. It is a power of its own. I have no finely spun theory about it, but I know that it is one of those energies that work in the personal world with no less actuality and solidity of effect than that with which gravity works in the material world; as positive in its results as the flow of the electric current, or as the play of sunbeams upon the frost-fettered soil in the spring.

The soul out toward which your heart moves with an affection exempt from carnal ingredients does not remain in the state in which your heart finds it. Something goes on inside it which is the product of your soul's action. Your soul, if it is a loving soul, is a radiant centre radiating both spiritual light and spiritual warmth—spiritual light which quickens the one or ones upon whom your affection bends itself into a wider and richer experience of the things which are beautiful, good and true; spiritual warmth which mellows the soul of such soul and stimulates in it the production of all those fine and delicate growths of thought and feeling and purpose which compose the soul's true life and admit it into an ever-enhancing state of power and prospect.

Now there, my friends, is the great opportunity that is made ours, according to the measure and wealth of our love-power, of bringing in a springtime and creating a fruit-yielding summertime in the lives of others. The best thing, the most powerful thing, the most transforming thing and enriching thing that we can give in this world is our affection.

Without underrating the value of brilliant ideas, correct opinions about things terrestrial and celestial, or large enterprises humanitarian in their extent, the greatest thing, the most tremendously powerful thing, the energy that carries in it the superlative possibility of redemption of every sort and along every line is love. Ideas may amuse the intelligence, immense opinions may command the respect of the thoughtfully inclined, yet such things leave the world where they find it, but love steals its way into the interior of the soul that your heart leans toward, is an irrigating current bringing moisture to any unfruitful areas that may be contained there, and working its quiet searching work in the soul's deep places, as the warm fingers of the sunbeam feel their gentle way into the soil and play tenderly around among the hidden roots.

"God so loved the world." The world's salvation commenced in God's heart, and is conducted in the throb of every human heart that carries to it the heat of the heavenly pulse. And when our work is tested, yours and mine, the value that we have been to the world will have to be estimated by the amount of love-deposit which we have been able to leave in the treasury of the world's life.

A WONDERFUL AERIAL CONTEST

The Nine Balloons at St. Louis Straining at Their Cables and Ready for the Start in the International Contest

ONCE more the balloon has taken the place in public interest that has been given lately to the trials of airships which have been darting about the air in various parts of the world from Italy to Norway. The international contest held at St. Louis brought aeronauts from several European countries to race for the Bennett cup.

J. C. McCoy and Capt. Chandler

A few days before the international contest a magnificent trip was made by Captain Charles DeForest, Chandler and J. C. McCoy in the U. S. Signal Corps Balloon No. 10. They went up a little after 4 in the afternoon. Late that night telegrams were received in St. Louis announcing that No. 10 had been seen scudding through the clouds over the State of West Virginia and was going at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. This showed that they had exceeded the record made the previous year and that they were safely winners of the Lahm cup. They landed in time to return to St. Louis and take part in the international contest.

Nine balloons started in the great race for the James Gordon Bennett trophy. They represented four nations — the United States, England, France and Germany. The largest balloon was the Anjou, of France. It held 79,500 cubic feet of gas. The United States, one of the American balloons, and the Lotus II., of England, were next in size, holding 75,000 feet of gas each.

The start was made from Forest Park, where sixty thousand people had gathered. The great balloons tugged at their moorings as if filled with life and anxious to be free. The crowd was greatly excited, and broke into a thundering cheer as the racers of the sky cast off and shot upward. The Pommern, of Germany, which was destined to be the winner, went first. A few moments later and the United States, flying a thousand feet lower, passed her, and another great cheer burst from the watchers below. In one place the America was but thirty-five feet from the ground. The aeronauts talked with people below, and threw out confetti on the children. Before six o'clock all had disappeared as if blotted out in the sky. The start was on Monday, and by Wednesday all of the balloons had landed, and it was found that the Germans in the Pommern had won.

The Winner, Oscar Erbsloeh, Just After Landing

The four balloons that made the best flights all landed well up the Atlantic Coast. The Pommern landed at Asbury Park, New Jersey, after traversing a distance in an air-line of 880 miles. A short time after the Pommern struck, the French balloon L'Isle de France landed four miles below her on the beach after a trip estimated at 878 miles, only two miles less than the distance made by the Pommern. The contest was so close that an official measurement was made to fix the winner with certainty.

The third place was gained by the German balloon Duesseldorf, which came down in Delaware, after covering 780 miles from the starting point. The America came fourth. It landed on the west shore of Chesapeake Bay, in Maryland, about 720 miles from the point of departure.

Erbsloeh, who piloted the winner, said that only once were they in doubt as to where they were. They came down and called to people below who informed them that they were over Fort Washington, Ohio. They saw the rivers and towns far below as if on a relief map. They would go up at times several thousand feet searching for favorable currents to bear them on their journey. During the day they found the currents varying greatly, but at night they sailed along evenly and without a tremor of their aerial craft.

At last they saw far below them the city of Philadelphia, and they tried to find a current blowing northeast, for they knew they would soon reach the Atlantic Ocean unless they could go in the direction of Eastern New York and Massachusetts. They were unsuccessful and soon saw the open sea. They had ballast and gas that would have done for five hundred miles more, but not enough to take them to Europe, so they decided to land in the streets of Asbury Park. The cord was pulled and they came down almost on the beach.

The following is a table of results of this great scientific contest:

Balloon	Pilot	Landed	Distance, Miles, from St. Louis
Pommern (Germany)	Erbsloeh	Asbury Park, N. J.	880
L'Isle de France (France)	Leblanc	Herbertsville, N. J.	878

Found Christ at the Noonday Meeting

STROUD, GLOSTER, ENGLAND.

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I read in your CHRISTIAN HERALD of recent date about the fiftieth anniversary of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting which was held in the month of October. As an old subscriber of your paper now on a visit to England from New Zealand, I ask the privilege to address you on that very important event, hoping it will interest your readers.

During the year 1857, I sailed from England to New York. Some time in 1860 I attended a service held in Broome Street, near Broadway. The minister, Peter Stryker, officiated. The word preached brought a deep conviction to my heart, which so impressed me that on inquiry, I found Mr. Stryker was living down Broome Street, where I lost no time in finding him. He kindly knelt down and prayed for me, telling me there were a few young men who met together in a building adjoining the Reformed Dutch Church in Fulton Street, to which I went the following Monday evening. I found the young men in an upper room, holding a prayer and testimony meeting. To my joy and delight, the Lord Jesus was revealed to my soul as my loving Saviour.

Among those young men was a Mr. A. Shaw, then a teacher in a public school, but afterward a minister of the Gospel, with whom I formed a loving friendship which was very profitable to my soul's welfare. On visiting New York in 1893, I looked for that building and church; but, alas! it was gone; but the meeting was still held in an upper room or hall, and on my going in I found Mr. Shaw and Brother C. Lanphier the only ones left of the three who were the means in God's hands of starting that prayer meeting which did so much good in the world. I was able to be present at the noon-day meetings for some time, till my employment compelled me to leave the city. The wonderful work of the Spirit manifested at those meetings I never shall forget. Mr. Lanphier gave me a little book with an account of the origin of the prayer meeting. I. HANDY.

HOW THE PANIC WAS FOUGHT

Women Depositors in Line at the Knickerbocker Trust

Crowds of Depositors at the Knickerbocker Trust, Fifth Avenue

NEW YORK has just passed through an experience which vividly recalled the scenes of the great panic of 1873. The panic of 1907, however, differed from its predecessors in being of shorter duration and more circumscribed in range, comparatively few localities in other States being materially affected by the metropolitan disturbance. It was hardly an unforeseen panic. For weeks prior to the bursting of the financial storm, there had been a general depression in securities of all kinds and a stringency in the money market, which far-sighted financiers recognized as a presage of coming disaster.

Monday, October 21, was a day of trepidation and forebodings. The banks and trust companies, noting conditions in Wall Street and the tightness of the money market, were shortening sail in the matter of loans and credits. On Tuesday, at the opening of business, a run was begun on several banks; but in most cases it was not of sufficient proportions to cause serious uneasiness. The exception was the Knickerbocker Trust Company, one of the largest financial concerns in the metropolis, with 21,000 depositors, $65,000,000 of deposits and some $70,000,000 of resources. Rumors which had gained currency the previous day made the Knickerbocker the focus of active disturbance. It was reported that the concern had applied to the Clearing House for a $3,000,000 loan, which was promptly refused after an examination of the bank's loans and securities.

At the height of the run, hundreds of depositors were in line at all the branches, and the withdrawals soon ran up into the millions of dollars. There were scenes of excitement, but no serious disorder. In vain the company's officials tried to stem the tide. When, unable to meet further demands, the doors were closed, over $8,000,000 had been withdrawn by depositors, and there was no aid in sight. Immediately before the closing a single institution presented a certified check for a million and a half dollars, which was paid. This was the last transaction of the Knickerbocker. Its suspension has been characterized as the "greatest single financial catastrophe in the history of the United States."

That the Knickerbocker was sound and would have been able to meet all demands in the ordinary course of business, had time been allowed, is generally admitted; but a spasm of fear seemed to have seized the business community, and the great institution fell a sacrifice to the excitement. Many down-town banks having balances in the Knickerbocker withdrew them at the down-town branch. No assistance was rendered by any of the allied trust companies, though it had been promised, and no capitalist came forward to proffer aid. It was a financial tragedy, which all the dramatic adjuncts combined to make complete.

It was not until after the suspension that all the facts relating to the Knickerbocker's battle for existence came out. Last September, the New York State Banking Department had pronounced it solvent; but later investigation had shown that the Knickerbocker's president, Charles T. Barney, had many large loans outstanding and was, in the language of Wall Street, "heavily extended." Unable either to take up these loans or increase his collateral, his loans were sold out. Mr. Barney had surrendered all his real estate, and indeed his entire fortune, to secure the loans, and at the demand of the Clearing House, he and his associate directors had resigned. There were also disclosures of other unprofitable investments of the Trust Company's funds; but its capital was unimpaired, and in ordinary times, it would have been able to meet all demands.

The Scene in Front of the Trust Company of America in Wall Street

Increased apprehension followed the closing of the Knickerbocker, and soon many unfounded rumors were afloat affecting other banks. The New York Clearing House Association, however, were confident of the stability of the national banks, and it was generally believed that the trust companies would also be able to weather the storm, which had been steadily gathering.

On Wednesday morning it was announced that the leading bankers had met in conference and decided to extend no aid to the Knickerbocker, whose affairs were now being looked into by the State Superintendent of Banks. Its new President, A. Foster Higgins, was striving hard to bring order out of chaos; but the doors of the Knickerbocker did not reopen.

The second act of the great financial drama began with a lively run on the Trust Company of America, the third largest of its kind in the metropolis. The committee of bankers had examined its books and securities and found its affairs in a satisfactory condition. At a meeting which was held in the offices of J. P. Morgan & Co., it was decided to supply the Trust Company of America with all the funds needed to meet the run. At the same time it was announced that Secretary of the Treasury Cortelyou had come to the relief of the financial situation, and was prepared to assist the banks with $15,000,000 of government funds, $6,000,000 of which would be released at once to the city banks upon their deposit of collateral with the Sub-Treasury. Secretary Cortelyou held repeated conferences with Mr. Morgan, George F. Baker, George W. Perkins, Frank A. Vanderlip, President Stillman of the City National Bank, State Controller Glynn and other leading financiers, and the situation was fully discussed and plans agreed upon for co-operative action to relieve the situation.

Several of the banks were helped; but it was a hard and exciting day, and the panicky feeling increased. In the stock market there had been only one notable failure, that of Mayer & Co., with liabilities at $6,000,000; but there was a general feeling that others would soon follow unless the banking situation quickly improved. The Trust Company of America now became the centre of interest. As soon as its doors were opened the run was on in earnest at the main office and branches; but, thanks to the aid promptly rendered, every demand was promptly met. Thousands of depositors stormed the doors at 44 Wall Street, and the lines lengthened as the day wore on. There were also runs, though less formidable, on the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, at Fifth Avenue and 43d Street, the Colonial branch of the Trust Company of America at 222 Broadway, and at the Bronx branch. The Dollar Savings Bank, at 147th Street and Third Avenue, was besieged by depositors, mostly small shopkeepers and working people. Police were on hand at all points, preserving order in the lines and keeping back the curious crowds of spectators.

At the close of business on Wednesday there was a decided feeling of improvement and a growing confidence. It was announced that the Trust Company of America—which had now ample funds to [illegible] and had paid out $8,000,000 during the day—would continue to meet all demands. The condition of the State and national banks was satisfactory. The [illegible] by Secretary Cortelyou and Mr. Morgan [illegible] had greatly relieved the situation. The [illegible] too, had rallied, reflecting the general [illegible]. The Recent Panic

THE financial storm in New York seems to have passed the crisis, although its effects may be felt for some time in other parts of the country. This is a time, however, when people should be extremely cautious in giving heed to rumors and sensational talk affecting the stability of any bank or business concern. Unquestionably, much of the evil results of the disturbance may be traced to sensation-mongers and to the foolish talk of irresponsible men reflecting upon business institutions of whose real conditions they know very little.

It should be remembered that even the soundest financial institution, if required at short notice to pay all its indebtedness, might find a difficulty in realizing on its collateral and making any large proportion of its assets available; yet public clamor, stirred up by unwise criticism, sometimes makes this demand, as it did in the case of one of our leading trust companies, which fell a victim to a storm that it might have weathered under ordinary conditions.

People naturally ask: "What is the cause of this disturbance among the banks, of this shortage of money in business circles, and this general lack of confidence?" If we turn to the bankers and business men themselves, as those best qualified to answer, we will receive the unanimous reply: It is the result of the unwise and indiscriminate attacks on the ablest leaders in our industrial and financial enterprises by those whose exalted position and grave responsibilities should make them the conservators instead of the destroyers of the best business interests of the country. They will add, too, and not without reason, that when one who wields the widest authority and influence utilizes those powers in a manner to involve all legitimate enterprise in undeserved suspicion, and to make our men of progress, whose genius and executive capacity have done so much to build up and develop this nation, industrially and otherwise, appear in the light of enemies of the people—when these things are done it is not to be wondered at if capital grows timid and our merchants, bankers, builders, founders, and manufacturers stand aghast in astonishment. What else than business demoralization, they pointedly ask us, could be expected to follow such a policy? As well might one hunt a gasoline leak with a lighted torch and expect to avoid explosion, as to "smash" the business interests of the country, through its leaders, and yet escape material damage to the community.

Architects tell us that every great cathedral has its key-note, which, if incessantly sounded, will ultimately level the structure to the ground. So with financial institutions; every bank and trust company, if taken at disadvantage and unduly assailed by unreasoning public clamor, stands in danger. Even the soundest bank might go down under persistent misrepresentation. The best established business, the financier of most abundant means, may be dragged down by the same pernicious methods of attack.

Now that the storm is blowing over, those who can calmly and dispassionately review the situation in New York cannot fail to be convinced that the recent panic, with all the loss and misery it will yet entail, might have been averted had a common-sense policy ruled the hour in high places. It is now clearly shown that our banks as a whole, with possibly a few exceptions, are sound; but throughout the country the impression had been persistently fostered that because the methods of some financiers were irregular, therefore all were guilty of loose and even criminal acts.

This policy of reckless condemnation, without investigation, was stimulated by the highest influence and produced its natural results. Institutions whose soundness had never before been called in question were assailed. The alarm spread in the hearts of the people and paved the way for the panic. At the eleventh hour, the Secretary of the Treasury stepped in to relieve the situation; but the real harm had already been accomplished.

With a clearer atmosphere and the clouds lifting, we can now see the folly of all that has taken place and how easily it might have been avoided had the wiser policy been pursued of remedying the defects in our banking system from the inside, instead of attacking the banks in general by violent clamor and denunciation from the outside. It is also true that had all the banks been scrupulously careful in their methods, the trouble could not have happened. The lesson to be learned from the financial crisis is that it is at no time safe to bank without proper reserves, and that any system of banking which does not observe this must signally fail. In certain cases, as New York's recent experience has shown, bankers have been too anxious to secure deposits and too willing to pay high rates of interest, while depositors, in their desire to secure high rates, have overlooked the essential safeguard of a sufficient reserve.

Outside of the financial storm centre in New York, the disturbance scarcely found an echo, and there is no record of any serious results to institutions in other cities. This is due to the fact that the general business of the country was never better than it is to-day. Our farmers' earnings this year will be enormous, notwithstanding that 1906 was a "bumper crop" year. They will have at least $7,000,000,000 to spend for goods. Country banks are in sound condition. Industrial enterprises are flourishing. Our gold product is $6,000,000 in excess of that of 1906. In general business, reports are everywhere encouraging. The real estate market is better than it ever was before. Altogether, the outlook is for a busy and prosperous season for all classes, and even if cotton and wheat are not so plentiful, they are bringing higher prices than formerly. With these facts in view, the depreciation in Wall Street securities becomes of secondary importance.

There is much in the situation to warrant an optimistic outlook, despite the croakers, to whom we would advise everybody to pay no attention. Go forward in confidence; the worst is over and there are brighter days right ahead.

The Flight of the Balloons

REPORTS of the aeronauts who took part in the recent contest from St. Louis to the Atlantic seaboard have been read with great interest by people the world over, who are all more or less interested in their thrilling journey through the air. Meteorologists and other men of science wish more especially to learn the action of air currents at different altitudes. It was reported by the Germans that on this hemisphere currents act quite the reverse of those found in European countries where they had tried their balloons before.

Several of the balloons used were "war balloons," and reports of their performances were forwarded to the military headquarters of the signal corps. The balloon was used to a certain extent in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71, and it is expected that in any struggle of the future it will play a prominent part. In fact, at the present time one is being used by the French to keep track of the movements of the Moors at Casablanca in Morocco.

Ballooning has not made great strides in public favor for many years. The participants in the present contest broke for the first time the record made in 1859, when a balloon went from St. Louis to Henderson, N. Y. Probably this is due to the fact that most investigators and inventors have come to the conclusion that the true solution of aerial navigation would be found in the pencil-shaped airship or the aeroplane, as the round balloon must go always with the strong wind.

It is interesting to know that the balloons differ little from those used over a century ago. As soon as hydrogen gas was discovered in 1760, it was suggested that weights might be lifted by attaching them to bags filled with the gas. In 1783, the Montgolfier brothers of Annonay, in France, sent up bags of paper that had been filled with heated air. This started the first rage for ballooning. In a few months experiments were tried with a hydrogen balloon that was sent up without passengers. In a few months, Pilatre de Rozier and the Marquis d'Arlandes made the first trip in a balloon ever made by man. It was of the dangerous variety known as the fire balloon. Shortly after a passenger balloon filled with gas was perfected, and made a successful trip. This gas balloon possessed all the essential features of the balloons that sailed away from Forest Park, St. Louis.

Probably ballooning will be used more and more as a recreation. There are now balloon clubs for this purpose in America and Europe. There were airship trials later at St. Louis, and several of those entered showed their ability to go against the wind and obeyed the steering gear perfectly. Whether these will be so developed that people will ever fly from country to country or from city to city, instead of going by train or steamer, is an open question. It would not be so wonderful as the Marconi wireless telegraph, and after this wonderful invention people are not ready to be greatly surprised at anything.

The Open Pulpit

THE recent triennial General Convention of the Episcopal Church, in Richmond, will go down in history as the most momentous assemblage in the annals of that great organization.

It declined to divide the country into provinces, to make primates, or metropolitans, of any of its bishops, or to abolish the Thirty-nine Articles. It also refused to do away with the statement that the Bible is the Word of God, although vigorous attempts were made in all these directions.

It took a long step toward the settlement of the negro problem, from the ecclesiastical point of view, in such a way as to retain the negroes closely to the Church, to offend neither Northerner nor Southerner, and to obviate any necessity of injecting the words, "race, color or condition" into the Constitution and Canons of the Church.

But the crowning glory of the Convention was its action on what is called "the open pulpit." The Rev. Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady of Toledo, O., introduced a resolution opening the pulpits of the Episcopal churches of the land to the clergymen of other Christian denominations not in communion with that body. The resolution was referred to a committee, which modified it considerably and unanimously reported it to the House of Deputies, where it was passed by an overwhelming majority. The House of Bishops, to whom it was then referred, also passed it by a practically unanimous vote.

As it now stands Christian men, not ministers of the Episcopal Church, are allowed to make addresses therein, with the consent of the bishop who has jurisdiction. Perhaps at first sight, this may not appear to be a very noteworthy concession, but when it is borne in mind that for three hundred years the pulpit of the Episcopal Church has been a closed one, the significance of the action is realized. And there is this further to be said: that however narrowly the door is opened at first is a matter of little moment, for all history shows that once a door is opened in any degree, the course of events will by and by throw it wide.

A score of years ago the Episcopal Church put forth a declaration of principles, popularly known as the Chicago Lambeth Quadrilateral, upon which it would be glad to consider unity with any other body of Christians which might subscribe to its principles. In the opening of the pulpit to ministers of other churches it has taken the first step necessary to render that declaration something more than a mere statement of intention.

The Parliament Building in Vienna — Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria-Hungary — The Royal Palace at Schoenbrunn

The Throne of Austria

ALL Europe has watched with anxiety the progress of the illness of the venerable Emperor of Austria-Hungary during the past few weeks. The intense oncern was due not only to regard for the life and char- cter of Francis Joseph, but to apprehension that his leath might precipitate the disintegration of his empire nd possibly cause disturbances in other States. There vas apparently little hope that he would recover, for he vas said to be suffering from pneumonia, and it was little ikely that a man seventy-eight years of age could sur- ive an attack of that dread disease. Late news, how- ver, is to the effect that he has endured it better than ight have been expected, and that if no new complica- ions ensue, he may recover. His vitality has been imply wonderful. The troubles he has borne during his ong reign of fifty-eight years have been greater than nost men would have been able to bear. His favorite rother Maximilian perished in Mexico. Then came his truggle with Louis Napoleon, in which he was defeated. le was again defeated in his struggle with Prussia. His nly son and heir died in a mysterious and, it is believed, shameful manner, at the castle of Meyerling. His ife, from whom he had been long estranged, had only een reconciled to him a short time, when she was ssassinated. His life has been one of successive trag- dies, and the aged monarch is said to complain bitterly f his loneliness.

The next heir to the throne is the Emperor's nephew, rchduke Franz Ferdinand, who is forty-five years of ge. Very little is known of him, on account of his ré- ired habits. It was hoped that he would marry one of he daughters of the Hungarian Archduke Frederick, nd thus unite the two portions of the empire. There ere four of these daughters of marriageable age, and he heir to the crown spent some time visiting their arents; but when he returned to Vienna, he almost roke his uncle's heart by declaring that he would not arry any of the young princesses, but would marry their overness, a noble lady of good family, known as the ountess Chotek. The Emperor finally yielded a reluct- nt consent, but stipulated that the lady should never be rowned Empress of Austria, nor should any child of the arriage succeed to the throne. The Archduke, there- ore, though he has two sons, has the vexation of seeing is brother's son being educated under the Emperor's uperintendence, as the future Emperor of Austria, to the xclusion of the Archduke's own children. The Arch- uke visited America during the Columbian Exposition t Chicago, and made a good impression on all whom he et. He is said to be a man of wide culture, and is the uthor of several books. It is understood that his politi- al sympathies are with Russia and that he has little riendliness toward Germany and Italy. We can but ope that in the difficult task he will have to undertake at he death of his uncle he may have the guidance which lone can make his reign beneficent to his people.

The meek will he guide in judgment: and the meek will he teach is way. (Ps. 25 : 9.)

o Burn Perpetual Lamps

A proposal is about to be carried out to make a per- etual memorial to the poet Dante. The municipality f Florence, in which city Dante was born in 1265, and he municipality of Ravenna, where Dante died in 1321, re to share in the project. It is intended to hang a mp in front of Dante's monument in Florence and nother in Ravenna above the poet's tomb. Each city ill contribute to the cost of keeping the lamps perpetu- lly burning as a symbol of the great poet's undying me and influence. The lamps are to be made of brass Venice, and will contain glass panels appropriately mblazoned. The acceptance of the idea by the city of lorence has in it the idea of atonement for the wrong one to the poet by the city in his lifetime. It fined him nd banished him and later made an edict that he was to e burned if taken. He never saw his native city again. le became a wanderer and nineteen years afterwards ied in Ravenna. Florence repented of its treatment of im, and built a magnificent tomb to contain his remains; ut Ravenna refused to part with them, though efforts to obtain them have continued for five hundred years. The people of Florence deplore at this day the conduct of their ancestors, but the atonement has been tardy. The intolerant Christian, who, like that Philadelphia clergyman who the other day said publicly that if he had his way all heretics should be burned, has need to remem- ber the warning Christ uttered on the subject:

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, and say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers in the blood of the prophets (Matt. 23 : 29, 30).

A Solution of Canada's Problem

The dread of an influx of Japanese and Hindu laborers which is perplexing the government and people of Canada was discussed recently by Mr. Rudyard Kipling, the famous author, who is now on a visit to Toronto. He called attention to the fact that there is more work need- ing to be done in the Canadian west than can be done by Canadian laborers. There was, he said, an absolute need of men, and the only way to prevent the coming of Asiatics was to obtain immigrants from Europe. "You must have laborers," said Mr. Kipling, "and the only way to keep the yellow man out is to get the white man in. If you keep out the white then you will have the yellow man, for you must have labor. England has five mil- lions of people to spare. Canadian labor is fearful of being swamped, but it will have to decide whether the influx it dreads shall be of Europeans or Asiatics. If the Europeans are not encouraged to come the Asiatics will pour in." Mr. Kipling evidently has faith in the prin- ciple in political matters that Christ enunciated in spiritual matters:

They enter in, and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first. (Luke 11: 26.)

The Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his Family

An Amateur Astronomer

A farmer's boy at Cottage Grove, near Madison, Wis., has been granted an enviable distinction. He has for some years been a diligent student of astronomy. He managed to obtain some lenses and constructed a hand made telescope, which he used to such purpose that he discovered two comets within a few months. He has now been notified that he need no longer use his hand made telescope. The fine instrument and the scientific apparatus at Washburn Observatory are placed at his disposal in turn with astronomical students, and he will receive the help of the best teachers in the University of Wisconsin in pursuing his study of astronomy. It is re- ported that the scientists at the University of Chicago have also heard of him, and have invited him to use the great Yerkes telescope. Such a reward, probably the one the young student counts the highest that the world could give him, seems to every one altogether suitable. It gives to him that has demonstrated his capacity for using it, the opportunity to gain still greater knowledge. That we are taught is the rule also in the spiritual kingdom, where the rewards go to those who have proved their fidelity in small matters.

Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance. (Matt. 13 : 12.)

An Officer's Self-sacrifice

A courageous act performed by an officer of our Navy is believed to have saved many lives a few days ago. Lieutenant William P. Cronan was in command of a turret on the U. S. flagship Connecticut, which was engaged in target practice off Cape Cod, Mass. There were four of the great eight-inch guns in action, and they had become somewhat heated by the rapid firing. They had been washed out and a new charge had been brought up. One of the bags containing a full charge had been placed in each gun, when the lieutenant noticed that there was a hole in one of the bags, through which some powder had fallen into the steel threads of the breech lock. The gunner whose duty it was to swing the heavy breech-block to and fasten it, began to perform his part. If that block was shut, the powder in the threads would be ground and ignite, and prematurely explode the charge. The result would be that the breech-block would be blown off and every man in the turret killed. The lieutenant heroically thrust his hand into the aperture, preventing the block closing. The disaster was averted, but the lieutenant lost one of his fingers, and the others were badly crushed. We admire a man who could thus forget himself and his own suffering in the effort to save others; but we too often forget that the whole human race was saved from eternal death by just that spirit dwelling in Christ.

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27 : 42.)

To the Pole by Bear Team

The novel project of utilizing polar bears for Arctic discovery has been conceived by Captain Roald Amund- sen, the famous Norwegian explorer. Captain Amund- sen is the discoverer who, about three years ago, found the northwest passage, which had been vainly sought by explorers for four hundred years. He now proposes to go in search of the pole. He intends to enter the Arctic Sea by way of Behring Strait and then drift northward with the Nippon current until near enough to make a dash for the pole. This is the route that was taken by the ill-fated Jeannette. The captain will take three sledges on his vessel, which will be equipped for a stay of six years in the Arctic. The novel feature of the expedition will be six polar bears, which are being edu- cated by the famous animal trainer Carl Hagenbeck. They are being taught to drag sledges and Captain Amundsen believes they will prove as tractable as dogs, and, being inured to the intense cold of the Arctic, will be more serviceable than the dogs hitherto used, as they have immense strength and endurance. The whole con- ception is an illustration of the power of man to subject animals far stronger than himself to forget their wild habits and work tamely for him. The horse is the most familiar instance, but in Eastern lands the elephant is harnessed to the plow is a still more conspicuous illustration of human supremacy. Now the discoverer proposes to utilize the bear in spite of the cunning of the patriarch:

Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great, or will thou leave thy labor to him? Job 39 : 11.

THE VICTORY OF THE WHOLE-HEARTED

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

LAST week's lesson showed us the Israelites in Canaan, deprived of the great leader who had brought them over Jordan into the land. They were in a critical situation, for the Canaanites were still strong in the land, in spite of the fact that their numbers had been reduced by Joshua's victories. Their surrounding neighbors were also hostile to them, and the Midianites especially were a numerous and powerful foe. The first six chapters of the book of Judges, which the teacher should read before teaching this lesson, give a vivid and graphic narrative of the turmoil in which Israel lived during that period, and present a clear idea of the crisis with which Gideon had to deal.

The three notes that follow each other over and over again in the book of Judges, as in human life to-day, are: Evil, distress, deliverance. In prosperity Israel forgets God and adopts the sensual and easy religion of the heathen about them. This apostasy withdraws God's protecting hand, and enemies overcome them. In adversity Israel repents and cries to God for help, and a deliverer is raised up. Already in succession, Othniel, Ehud and Deborah have delivered Israel from its foes. A fourth time since Joshua's day they have backslidden, but their punishment by the oppression of the Midianites has brought repentance, and that insures deliverance. Another deliverer is at hand.

The Chosen Instrument

Gideon was beating out wheat (6: 11). God would work deliverance, not by a trained warrior, but by a farmer in his work clothes. From the beginning God's great leaders have been shepherds, herdsmen, farmers, fishermen and the like. If God does not call such workers from their tasks to serve him, let it not be forgotten that he calls them to serve him in their tasks. "God has a plan for every man." Ehud was either a left-handed man, or, as the margin says, entirely without the use of his right hand (Judges 3: *15). Gideon was the least in his father's house and very poor (Judges 6: 15). Then an ox-goad and a stone were used to deliver Israel from their enemies on different occasions, whilst an old woman, a herdsman's wife, and a weak captive were God's instruments at other times.

Gideon was to deliver a nation from armed foes, but by way of preparation for that greater task he was called first to deliver his own village from a moral peril by smashing his father's idol and substituting a purer worship. His very name devoted him to Baal. Here is encouragement for those of bad heredity. His courage saved his father (vs. 31, 32). Let the man who longs to be a great hero try his hand, first of all, by daring to oppose some popular custom of the group among whom he lives. The man who of a whole village dares to stand alone for God, as he who rules his own spirit, may be "greater than he that taketh a city." In heathen lands to-day there are many instances where a courage as great as Gideon's has been shown in renouncing the family idols, of which the following Y. M. C. A. story is but a sample:

Ten miles from Jaffna, in the island of Ceylon, out in a little village, there lived a mother and her two sons. They decided that the older, whom we shall call Samuel, should be sent to college, for after getting his degree he could better help to pay off the mortgage on the little farm.

It was a great day for the lad and visions of the future arose before him when he should be a graduate. In college he fell in with a native Christian student who knew of the joy of salvation and was all aglow with the desire that others should hear of the Master through him. He met Samuel, and there was at once a mutual affection. On up to midnight many a time they sat talking together of the good news of a Saviour born for the sins of men. How it appealed to that village boy! What a contrast was that pure and holy life to the awful gods and repulsive stories in Hinduism! There was a power that drew him.

A Persecuted Son

It came vacation time and Samuel returned to visit his mother with a new joy in his heart, a new power. She forced him to go to the temple, where the priest shaved the boy's head, covered his body with ashes and put the mark of paint upon his forehead to show he had that day worshiped Siva. "Now," they said, "we shall not send you to college any longer." But they reconsidered. It meant so much for the boy to get his degree that they could not allow him to give it up. So they told him they would take his Christian books away from him and send him to a college in India, where they did not know about Christ. They sent him to Calcutta, where he found Christians; but when his mother found it out she stopped sending him money. So there he was with no money to pay his college fees, his board or his room rent, and what was he to do. The head of the college presented his case to a missionary and the missionary to a business man who said he would support him in college.

A Doubter as Leader

Show me a sign (v. 17). It should be a great encouragement to the honest doubter, whose doubts come not through a depraved heart and will, that God could use a man that needed four miraculous "signs" to change doubt to assurance. When his faith was fully assured he had the secret of dauntless courage, for the vision of God banishes all fear. "How can we fear anything with him looking at us!" A young girl was in a railroad wreck but showed no sign of fear. "I was only surprised," she said afterwards; "I was not afraid, for father was with me, and we were in God's hands."

"God is with us, God is with us," so our brave forefathers sang,
Far across the field of battle loud their holy war-cry rang;
Never once they feared nor faltered, never once they ceased to sing—
"God is with us, God is with us, Christ our Lord shall reign as King!"

"By the men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand"

The people that are with thee are too many (7: 2). As the leader must be tested, so must the followers. First, the cowards, who had enlisted impulsively, were given full permission to go home. So Cromwell made his army invincible. So might we multiply the real fighting strength of our churches by clearing the roll of the cowardly and inconsistent. The best way to do that is by more care about taking in the half-hearted. It would be better if we cared less for statistics and more for real salvation, that proves itself in work and in restitution, as in the case now to be related.

Out on a cool hill station in India, Mr. and Mrs. Leslie had a cozy little bungalow. To them it was far more really "home" than was their much larger house in a big Hindu city.

A German Bible Given

Mr. Leslie's hobby was books, and he had collected a large number in both places. But he possessed one volume for which no one seemed able to find a use. It was a very well-bound German Bible; neither he nor his wife could understand it, and they could hear of no one wanting it. A year or two afterwards, Mrs. Leslie went to visit a small hospital near the bungalow. Directly she returned, she said: "In the hospital I found a poor German. Once he must have been a very fine man; now he is a wreck, both spiritually and physically, through gambling and drink. He speaks English, but not well, and he looks utterly miserable."

To that lonely foreigner, a stranger in a strange land, that handsome Book in his own tongue came as a wonderful surprise. The words in that familiar language breathed of the German Fatherland that he never expected to see again, and eagerly he read page after page; he was brought to Christ and to a new and better life. But Gideon's second test was more subtle—that eliminated the self-indulgent who cast soldierly duty aside to gratify their thirst in the very sight of their foes. Victory in business, in politics, in literature, belongs to the man who keeps his body under, to whom duty is first, and even diet a part of his devotion. We write this lesson among people who eat seven to nine times a day, three of these meals being banquets, with several courses of flesh, all of them saturated with stimulants. Thus brain as well as soul is kept in constant eclipse. The test of self-indulgence in these days is usually something stronger than water. A business man seeking an assistant for important duties might well take the rare man, if he can find him, who drinks water without food as often as others, who make no use of their education at the table, "wash down" their food with stimulants.

But the water test also is still effective, for rainy election days and rainy prayer-meeting nights make a tragic showing of the shallowness of both the patriotism and religion of all except a stalwart few. Those who know most of men are sadly constrained to confess that not more than one patriot in a hundred and not more than one church member in a hundred is weather proof, reliable, even in heat and storm. A father or mother who finds in weather that would not keep them from a concert or social party a sufficient excuse for not going to church, is doing more to make infidels of the children than any sceptical books can do.

Rain as a Test

In a recent winter, when twelve Sundays out of fourteen, in Pennsylvania, were days of heavy down-pour, church offerings as well as attendance were seriously reduced, but a church in Philadelphia kept good audiences through all that water test, because the pastor had organized a fidelity band of twice the size of Gideon's, pledged to be at church, especially when snow or rain would make their attendance doubly needed. Here we see the value of pledges and organization to hold men up to their best.

In this connection we may well ponder the words of President Roosevelt, on May 2, 1907, contrasting the life of ease with a life of earnest and worthy endeavor, words that were thought worthy to be telegraphed around the world: "I. America is to stand simply for the accumulation of what tells for comfort and luxury, then it will stand for little indeed when looked at through the vistas of the ages. America will stand for much, provided only that it treats material comfort, material luxury, and the means for acquiring such as the foundation on which to build the real life, the life of spiritual and moral effort and achievement."

All the host ran and cried and fled. This story of victory matches the famous "Veni, vidi, vici," of Julius Cæsar. The Midianites outnumbered the Israelites four hundred and fifty to one. But apart from the miracle, history is full of the victories of few over many, not in war alone, of which Thermopylæ is the closest parallel to Gideon's more perfect triumph, but in business and politics and religion and reform.

Self-reproach After Dinner

Just a few hours after the awful Iroquois Theatre fire in Chicago, a lady who was returning from the city to her home at Oak Park, noticed in the seat opposite her in the street car, a young lady who seemed so pale and agitated that she finally ventured to engage her in conversation and ask the cause of her unusual excitement. With intense emotion, the young lady stated that she was one of the few who escaped unhurt from the terrible disaster at the theatre, she having been borne along by the fear-maddened crowd, trampling upon the writhing forms of those who had fallen, never to rise again. When she had finished, the older lady said: "Certainly you ought to feel thankful that you escaped such a frightful death." Quickly the now weeping girl replied: "Yes, I know I ought to be thankful, but oh, I didn't save anyone!" Hoping to comfort her, the lady soothingly said: "Yes, dear, but you were perfectly excusable in acting for yourself under such intense excitement." Instead of taking comfort from the words, the trembling girl only bowed her head and sobbed aloud: "Yes, but I didn't even try to help anyone." Even in heaven, if anyone gets there who is so half-hearted as to try to save no one else, there will be regret to dim the joy. Though the proportion of the whole-hearted may not be greater now than in Gideon's day, the total of God's army is so much greater that the faithful make a mighty host.

A MODEL OF SELF-HELP IN THE SOUTH

STUDENTS OF MAYESVILLE INSTITUTE, SOUTH CAROLINA, ON THE CAMPUS

OUR readers who have generously contributed to the support of the Mayesville Institute in South Carolina will be glad to learn that marked progress is being made there. A recent visitor from Boston, Mass., reports that though his visit was unexpected, he found the studies proceeding in orderly, systematic fashion and the students enthusiastically prosecuting their various duties. He was particularly interested in the new building for the trades' school. It was built by the students themselves, of bricks they had made from the quarry belonging to the Institute, and was a strong substantial building, which would do credit to city bricklayers. Other students in the carpentry department had put in the floors and studding. Of course all had been done under the superintendence of the Institute instructors, but it showed that the boys had been intelligent workers.

In the other departments, notably the blacksmith and metal-working section, and in the wheelwrights' shop, the work was eminently satisfactory. The pride the boys take in their work, and their appreciation of the value it will be to them in making themself-supporting, was very encouraging. So much has been said of the incurable laziness of the negro, and of his lack of ambition, that the conditions at the Mayesville Institute are a welcome vindication of his character. Boys who are willing to work hard during a part of the day, for no other pay than the education they get during the other part, are deserving of all praise and encouragement. That there are so many of this kind is an embarrassment to the managers of the Institute. Money is sorely needed, and there is no money in educating boys of this kind, though there is honor and satisfaction. Miss Emma Wilson, the Superintendent, says it has been necessary to refuse more than a hundred applications this year of boys and girls who want to pay for their education by their labor. It has required a heart of adamant to refuse some of them; bright, eager, persistent, and ready for any kind of self-denial, but the treasury was empty, and the labor of the would-be students could not be made to pay for their board and the salaries of teachers. One bright boy who was rejected returned in triumph with $35, given him by a well-to-do white friend who thought it a pity he should miss an education when he could obtain it for so small a sum. The gratitude of that boy was a thing never to be forgotten, and must have been a lasting reward to his white patron.

Students Busy in the Brickyard of the Mayesville Institute, South Carolina

A sad contrast to his case was that of a girl whose father is a farmer. His crops failed last year and in the effort to square accounts with his creditors, he had to sacrifice his mules and implements. His daughter had spent one term in the Institute, but he could not afford to pay for another. She has to stay at home and work this year, but she writes Miss Wilson that she has been trying to keep on with her studies, but "cannot get over the difficult places." Every one knows what those are and can but wish that, like the boy above mentioned, she might find some friend willing to provide the required funds. However, she writes that she is doing all she can to make use of the learning she did gain and has a large class in the Sunday School.

It is a notable fact in connection with this Institute that it is the result of an effort of the colored race to help themselves. There is an advisory board of white ministers and laymen, but the managers and the teachers are all colored. They have a sympathetic interest in the pupils and know exactly what they need to make them self supporting. The supreme need of the Institute is money; but already its managers have done so much with so little, that they have a fair claim on the generosity of every sincere friend and well-wisher of the colored race.

OPTIMISM AND PESSIMISM

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

AT the threshold of Life, as I started on my journey, I met two travelers.

One had the face of an Angel, strong, hopeful, courageous, loving. The other was gloomy, forbidding and stern. The scowl on his brow and the sneer on his lips spoke of defeat and bitterness, and contempt of God and man.

I took my first step on the journey and the two travelers at once joined me, one on each side.

"I am Optimism," said one. "Walk with me and I will cheer thee with good company, if I do say it."

"Better go with me," said the other. "I am Pessimism. I rail at all things, but I see the facts of life. No superficial or false estimate of history blinds me to what life truly is. If thou wilt get the most out of it, come with me."

"The greatest fact of all," said Optimism, "is God. If thou wilt walk with me thou shalt have God with thee every step. For I am born of him and I can tell thee where he may be found every moment."

"That is all very well," sneered Pessimism. "But if thou goest with him thou must bother thyself with thoughts of conscience, and duty, and obligation, and responsibility, and many other obsolete and worn-out theories long ago discarded by an enlightened age of progress. Come with me. All thou hast to do is to eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die."

"And after death the judgment," said Optimism. "But a judgment thou needst not fear if thou wilt come with me. For fear is taken away out of the souls of all those who journey over the way in my company."

"Hear him!" quoth Pessimism, laughing harshly. "What childish folly to shut the eyes to all the misery of a world of pain and defeat and loss! The only things worth living for are the things of the senses. It does not pay to deny ourselves, to carry burdens, to help others, to practise what is called love. Give me the facts in the case. Come. Come with me and live according to the facts."

"The greatest fact in the universe," said Optimism, smiling, "is the fact of Jesus Christ. Not even Pessimism has ever been able to wipe him off the pages of history. Come with me and I will introduce thee to him and to Eternal Life."

Then, at that, Pessimism flew into a rage, and in language that ranted and raved he cursed all holy and reverent things. And as I hesitated, strangely enough, for Pessimism seemed to speak with a hypnotic attraction that had centuries of power behind it, I saw Optimism smile again and he suddenly and lovingly drew his hand over my eyes and there fell from them as it were scales, so that I saw by the side of Pessimism, crowding close up to his presence, certain fearful shapes that made me shrink back closer to Optimism: for around Pessimism surged Defeat, and Despair, and Stoicism, and Cruelty, and Indifference, and Unrest, and Cynicism, and Criticism, and Faultfinding, and Infidelity, and Moroseness, and Bitterness, and lastly, a grim figure with a fearful grin of triumph that I recognized as Death. And these figures brandished certain symbols. One carried a jailer's bunch of keys and the manacles of a prisoner. Another held up the germs of all diseases in a phial. Another threw a searchlight on piles of wrecked and ruined homes. Another waved aloft a book of memories of evil deeds, and still another the record of past misdeeds and thoughts. The sight was so terrible I crowded closer to Optimism and put my trembling hand into his, upon which my fear departed, and I saw [illegible] beautiful companions: Divine Enthusiasm; Hope with her wreath of intwined garlands on her brow; To-morrow, lifting a light above her head and looking at the Day after herself; Sweet Forgiveness of Sin with her foot on the grave of the Past; Friendship, and Home, and Children; and best of all, the [illegible] love-crowned figure of Eternal Life.

Then said I to Optimism, "[illegible] thou indeed promise to accompany me all the way by day and by night?"

"Yea, soul of mine. That is my mission. I have come [illegible] of [illegible] the time."

So I trustingly put my hand into the hand of Optimism and pressed forward, and as I did so, Pessimism and his train retreated out of sight into the darkness and departed into their own place. "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The Golden Rule Saloon

By MARION EARL

CHAPTER III

ONE morning as the senator approached the saloon, he met another man who had much of the same general appearance as himself. "Good morning, Hood," he called cheerily; "how are you? I haven't seen you for the longest time."

"I haven't been out much," was the somewhat feeble reply. "I haven't been well."

"Have you seen the new saloon yet?"

"No, I haven't. I'll tell you, senator, you and I would be a great deal better off if we had let liquor alone all these years. I had to stop. The doctor said it was getting away with me. I haven't taken a drink for two months. I don't dare to."

"That's all right, but just step in and take a look at the inside. You won't recognize the old place."

"I'd rather not go in."

"Oh, come on, man! What's the harm in taking a look?"

He took the other by the arm and led him inside. Lee was most cordial.

"I hear you have been sick," he said, with sympathy in his voice. He proceeded to comment on the fact that Hood had never visited the new saloon, and asked him his opinion, and ended by inviting him to drink.

The other refused, but the atmosphere of the place and the persistence of the senator overcame the weakness of his will, and at last he yielded. Years of excess had formed an appetite which repeated attempts to abstain had not changed materially. He had kept away from the saloon for fear of his weakness.

Now the restrained fires of passion were loosed, and it was not long till he became unmistakably intoxicated. Then Lee, true to his avowed intention to run a "respectable place," refused to give his customer any more liquor. With reeling, tottering steps, and angry curses at his failure to get more drink, the old man left the place and made his way by a devious trail down the street to Marvin's Place, where there were no scruples against selling drink to any one who had the price or the credit. Late that night, Hood was dropped, limp and helpless, on the doorstep of his humble little home. A hand rapped at the door, and a gruff voice informed the woman who appeared, "Here's yer old man."

The wife and the son got the drunken man to bed, but the evil work was done. Next day the doctor said that the man's condition was so feeble from his recent illness that this new attack might result in delirium, with hardly a hope of recovery.

"Didn't I tell you," he demanded of the patient," that it would kill you if you got drunk again? I'd think you were old enough to know better."

"I didn't mean to, but I—I couldn't help it," wailed the sick man.

The doctor repressed an expression of scorn. What use was there in saying sharp things to a man whose life was so soon to close?

Next afternoon, the preacher stood at the bedside trying to say something to lighten the darkness of death into which the despairing soul was sinking. Summoning his remaining strength, the sick man, looking into the face of the visitor with terror-haunted eyes, gave his dying declaration.

"It's no use, parson, to pray for me. I've made a bad mess of living, and it's all over."

Then beckoning the listener down close, he made his last request.

"For God's sake, won't you get me a little brandy? just a sip?"

Then, with a cry that was partly delirium, partly despair, the old man passed away.

The simple funeral was held at the house. Only a few followed the hearse to the grave. It was only old Hood, they said, who had had a fine chance in life and wasted it for drink, and ended his career by his own folly.

Not long after the burial, Marvin, the saloonkeeper, called on Mrs. Hood. As soon as he had taken the proffered chair, he proceeded to business.

"I've got here a little bill that your husband owed me when he died. I suppose you want to pay it. I'm needing money pretty bad, and would consider it a favor if you would attend to it at once."

Mrs. Hood, who had been standing with her hand resting upon the back of a chair, dropped into the seat. For months she had lived on the most frugal fare. For years she had borne the sorrow and neglect of her husband's evil habits. The shock of the death was severe. Now there was no strength left in either body or spirit to meet a trying situation.

"What is the bill for?" she inquired in a trembling tone.

"For goods Mr. Hood got at my place. The account runs back for several years."

"For liquor, do you mean?"

"Liquor and cigars."

"And you expect me to pay it?"

"Certainly; it will stand against the estate."

"But there is not a cent of money, only this house. Mr. Hood had a small pension which was our living."

"The house is worth at least seven hundred dollars."

"But if it is sold I won't have a roof over my head." Her voice gained strength as she talked, until she spoke with a quiet positiveness.

"What is the matter with Arthur? He's big enough to take care of you. How old is he? He must be eighteen."

"He is almost nineteen, but——"

"Oh, well, I didn't come to talk about your affairs. I only hope you will pay the bill right off. Good day." And the saloonkeeper walked out.

In her enfeebled condition, the shock of the interview was a severe one. The undertaker's bill was unpaid, and there was no prospect of meeting it, but her pride was so strong that, when the preacher asked her circumstances, she told him that there was no mortgage on the home, and that they could live from Arthur's wages.

Arthur was a grievous disappointment to her. He was able-bodied, but would not work. Several opportunities came to him immediately. He refused to accept a steady place on a farm a half-mile from town, on the pretext that he preferred some other kind of work. A possible position in a grocery store he refused, because the hours were too long. He did an occasional job that suited his fancy and earned a mere pittance. This he spent largely on himself, leaving his mother to get on as she might. If it had not been for the neighbors, she would have suffered from constant hunger.

One day, Roy Lee called Arthur Hood into the saloon.

"How would you like a place with me?" he asked.

"I had not considered the matter."

"Well, now, I'll tell you, I feel like I was a little to blame for the way your father went, and I want to do the right thing. The business is growing, and I need a man to sweep out once in a while and keep things in shape. I've had a man for that, but I want a man I can trust behind the bar. I'll give you forty dollars a month to start with. What do you say?"

"I'll take it," was the eager reply. Here was a position that suited his tastes.

"S'pose your mother will be willing?"

"Mother? Oh, I do as I please!"

"I've got a fine place to work," he told his mother that night, with a show of enthusiasm. "The wages are all right and will be increased. We can live easy, and maybe I can save enough to pay father's funeral."

For a moment hope rose high in her troubled heart. Could it be that he was

HOW DO YOU WASH YOUR CURTAINS?

There are twenty wrong ways; only one right way.

The right way is easy. The wrong ways are hard; hard on the curtains; doubly hard on the temper.

This is the right way:

Shake and brush curtains to remove the dust. Mend breaks. Soak in Ivory Soap suds and cold water for two hours, or over night if that is more convenient. Work the curtains gently up and down in the water and squeeze them between the hands to get the dirt out. Put them into clean warm suds with ammonia added, and keep changing the water until the curtains are clean. Never wring curtains by hand; lay them on a strip of cloth and put carefully through the wringer. Rinse well in several waters, and put through hot, moderately thick starch. If the curtains are white, the starch should be blued; if cream colored, strong coffee should be added to it. Two or three curtains may be dried at the same time on one frame. If you have no frame, lay clean sheets over the floor of an unused room, stretch the curtains into shape and pin each point so that it will not slip. If points are out of shape when dry, they may be dampened with a cloth and ironed.

going to settle down to his duty and take care of her?

"Where?" she asked.

"Mr. Lee just offered me the place."

"In the saloon?"

He assented.

"Oh, Arthur! I would rather see you in your coffin!" she almost moaned. "Your father was one of the noblest men when we were married. He had a good practice and was counted a successful lawyer. But the habit got hold of him and ruined every prospect. You are so much like him that you won't be safe in such a place. I'd rather starve."

"Nonsense!" he retorted angrily. "I don't have to make a fool of myself. I've heard all your preaching before. It's all settled."

He stalked from the room in a rage. All night long she sobbed and moaned in the anguish of her soul, alone in her cheerless room. And the recording angel wrote the story of another breaking heart in his book of fate.

Arthur liked his place, and the months went by. At first he did not drink; but he was popular with some of the young men, and they got into the habit of coming to the saloon. After a little he drank with them, and many nights, when Lee was present to look after the bar, he joined them at the card tables.

"Go ahead," was Lee's advice, "we want to be sociable here."

It all seemed innocent enough at first; but the path of evil habit is steep and quickly traveled. At first Lee had refused to sell liquor to minors at all; but when he found that Marvin was glad of their patronage, he changed. He "needed the money in his business," he said. For a time, he was careful to exclude any who were at all intoxicated. But he soon relaxed here. For they would go straight to Marvin's Place for more liquor. He did not exactly like to see the things he saw, but he got his conscience in the way of laying the blame all on his customers. He had gone in debt in fitting out the saloon, and must have trade; so the way was paved for what happened a few months after Arthur Hood entered his employ.

That night, the crowd of young men who had come to make this their regular nightly resort was divided. Some were gambling at cards, and some were at the pool table. Arthur was at the latter. The interest in the game was intense. They played till long after midnight.

The trouble began with a dispute over the position of a ball. Both Arthur and his opponent were flushed with liquor. The language grew violent. Arthur received a blow on the shoulder from a billiard cue. Enraged, he sprang at his opponent. The others kept the two apart, but the night broke up in excitement. Lee was angry at Arthur for mingling in a disturbance.

"We can't afford to have any trouble in here," he declared next morning. "This is a first-class place, and you can keep out of the games if you don't know enough to behave yourself!"

"But he struck me."

"Yes, just a tap on the shoulder. What did it amount to? You were mad enough to have brained him, if you had not been held back."

"And if I had, it would have been your fault as much as mine. I never drank liquor and gambled till I came into your saloon."

"I like a man who is man enough to do what he wants to, without playing the baby act. I've been in this saloon longer than you have, and have never tasted liquor. I didn't force you in here, and if you don't like it, you can quit."

"I'd quit if I wanted to."

"You'll quit to-night. I've got to be out of town to-day or I'd kick you out now, you puppy!"

Music Lessons FREE

In Your Own Home

A WONDERFUL offer to every lover of music, whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing, or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11-year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil.'

We have been established seven years—have thousands of pupils from eight years of age to seventy. Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail, free.

after a stormy forenoon, brought affairs to a welcome climax, relieving the whole situation by bringing vast financial reinforcement. In the early hours, however, the battle waged as it had done during the two preceding days, with the issue still apparently in doubt. The Trust Company of America continued to pay all comers, and the deposits exceeded the withdrawals. A few of the smaller New York banks, which had withstood the intermittent run, now closed their doors temporarily and put up bulletins announcing that, although they were entirely solvent, they deemed it prudent, in justice to their depositors, to suspend payments until confidence was restored. Among those that adopted this precautionary policy were the Hamilton Bank, West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, the Twelfth Ward Bank, East One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, the U. S. Exchange Bank, West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, and the International Trust Company, a comparatively small concern, 206 Broadway.

Downtown, in the business centres, there was still general trepidation and very little sign of reviving firmness in the financial situation. Notwithstanding the assurance of Secretary Cortelyou that the government had decided to help the banks to stem the tide of withdrawals by placing $25,000,000 at their disposal, the same ominous-looking lines of depositors could be seen at the doors of those banks that had borne the brunt of the storm the previous day. White-faced, eager men and women took their positions in front of the downtown offices of the Trust Company of America and kept vigil through the long hours until the bank opened. All classes seemed to be represented in these gatherings—business men and refined women, shopkeepers, clerks, servants, chauffeurs, messenger boys. Some of the watchers were served with coffee and sandwiches by friends during the night. A few women, unable to stand the strain, became hysterical and were carried away.

That night before the relief came was one long to be remembered in Wall Street. Every office in the financial district had apparently kept open all night long and the electric lights were still aglow when day broke. In the Treasury Building clerks were busy the whole night counting out and packing the government cash in bags to be ready for the harassed banks. In the offices of the great Trust Company, over one hundred employees were preparing carefully yet confidently for the coming day's siege. They worked with a will, knowing they were going to win. Distinctions of position seemed for the time to have been forgotten, millionaire and clerk working and lunching together through the night hours, while the long dark line of silent besiegers waited without.

That night, although the outside world did not know it till next forenoon, the great financiers who represented the combined millions of New York's largest institutions had resolved to come to the front and to place their united resources at the disposal of the harassed banks. Shortly before noon on Thursday, the effect of this arrangement became apparent, and there was a sudden and tremendous change for the better all along the line. At the banks, the officials' faces wore a more complacent expression than they had done for days past. Wall Street became semi-jubilant, a bear raid on stocks was checked midway and prices began to rise. In the business houses and counting-rooms there was a general feeling of relief, and even the excited crowds at the doors of the banks showed the influence of some great change.

This transformation had been effected by a number of public-spirited men of great wealth, who, under the leadership of J. Pierpont Morgan, the well-known banker, had thrown their colossal resources into the battle at the propitious moment. It was said that the Rockefeller interest was also an active factor in this great work of breaking the panic. Hundreds of bags filled with currency were transferred to the offices of the Trust Company of America, and it was announced that funds to the extent of $50,000,000 would be placed at the disposal of the trust companies from this source, if needed.

But the money kings did not stop at relieving the banks. In Wall Street, the stringency of money had forced the rate for loans steadily upward all the way from 40 to 50, and some loans were recorded as high as 100 and even 125 per cent. President Simmons of the Fourth National Bank, President Stillman of the National City Bank, and the other financiers who were operating as a bankers' pool, in conjunction with Mr. Morgan, decided that a bold step was necessary to relieve the stringency. At an hour when the loan rate was 100, the Morgan interests electrified the market by offering through their representatives $30,000,000 to be loaned at normal rates. This resulted in immediate relief and restored confidence, the brokers cheering Mr. Morgan loudly when the announcement was made.

Up to the close of business on Thursday, after the greatest single run in the history of American finance, the Trust Company of America had paid out $18,000,000, of which $10,000,000 represented Thursday's withdrawals. But it took in more than it paid out on the second day. The tide had clearly turned. The other trust companies and the national banks met all demands, and were at no time in serious trouble. At many banks, the deposits had begun to flow back in an encouraging volume. Secretary Cortelyou, Mr. Morgan, and all the leading bankers on Friday morning regarded the crisis as past. A few concerns, however, that were disabled by the fierce struggle of the first few days, withdrew from the fight. In Brooklyn the First National Bank temporarily closed its doors. The Brooklyn Bank, Borough Bank, Jenkins Trust Company and Williamsburg Trust Company also suspended temporarily. These banks, all of which are believed to be solvent, took this step as a matter of precaution.

On Friday the New York savings banks decided to enforce the sixty days' notice against withdrawing depositors, which was generally regarded as a wise and timely step and one that tended to discourage the runs on the other banks. Signs of returning confidence were now apparent on all sides. There was a general hope, that if the improvement held, the suspended banks, almost without exception, might soon be in a position to resume. The Clearing House, it was announced on Saturday morning, October 26, would further aid the situation, if necessary, by issuing loan certificates to take the place of currency, for the use of the banks in making their exchanges, leaving their funds available for other demands.

Such in outline is the story of the most exciting week New York has known since 1873. That a great panic, with the complete collapse of securities and many consequent failures, was averted, is due in part to the promptness of Secretary Cortelyou in coming to the relief of the situation, but most of all to the splendid courage of the foremost financiers, who, under Mr. Morgan's leadership, threw their entire available resources into the scales and saved the day. One result of the experience will be the introduction of needed banking reforms and additional safeguards against irregular methods of investment.

The First Philippine Assembly

NDER an act of the United States Congress, which provided for the establishment of a territorial legiture, the election of candidates for first popular assembly in the Philipes took place on July 31. While the wer House was elected by the voters mselves, the Senate or Upper House composed of five Civil Commissioners presenting American authority, and w in charge of governmental affairs in Archipelago.

There are several native political rties in the Philippines, the most werful being the Nationalists, the lependents and the Progressists. The t two, who have the support of the jority of the population, favor imme- te independence, while the Progressist rty favor the present policy of the vernment, which is the gradual intro- tion of autonomy.

Of the 7,000,000 population, 2,500,000 ives and others were qualified to ister and vote, but only 250,000 went the polls. A suffrage act, which de- nded certain educational and property alifications, disfranchised a great ma- ity of the working classes, and thou- nds of those who could have voted re- ed to do so, because they considered it less to support their unpopular plat- m. At the election, 50 per cent. of votes were cast by the Nationalists, le the Progressists cast only a little than one-third.

Of the 87 members who constitute new Assembly, a majority are i-American—men who have worked opposition to American control. It believed, however, that even these will sound judgment and discretion, and, a whole, work in comparative har- ny with the island administration. In er words, the Assembly will become a ctical school of experience, which l better qualify its members for self- ernment hereafter.

The first meeting of the Assembly was l in the Ayuntamiento building, or y Hall, in Manila, on October 16. As no striking examples of leadership e developed, and none could be ex- pected of a body of new and inexperienced men.

Complete autonomy is the ultimate purpose of the American government, as soon as the Filipinos show their fitness for it. At present our flag protects them from outside nations, while local and municipal affairs are put in their own hands, under our guidance.

Secretary Taft, at a banquet given in his honor in Manila lately, declared that the future prosperity of the Philippine Islands depends primarily upon the natives themselves. They must make progress as a nation, and it is the duty of the business men to help them to better their condition. "I am glad," he said, "that the Assembly has been established, and hope it will take over some of the responsibility of the government. Capitalists and others looking for franchises and concessions hereafter must come to the Assembly with their requests. The Assembly will strengthen the hands of the government, which is anxious and ready to advance the prosperity of the islands." It has been charged that the government had not the proper sympathy with the American merchant in the islands, but this, he said, was not true. There could be no prosperity for anybody unless there was progress for the whole Philippine people.

A great demonstration in honor of Secretary of War William H. Taft took place at a banquet arranged by a committee composed of members of the Manila Assembly on October 21. A silver loving cup of native make was presented to Mr. Taft, who in expressing his thanks said he was gratified when he heard the President of the Assembly say the United States had kept its every promise made to the Filipinos in letter and in spirit. He urged the importance of education in order to overcome the tendency blindly to follow one man. It was necessary to give all an equal opportunity that the son of the humblest person might aspire to the highest position in the State. He said it was important to choose the best men as delegates to the National Congress.

Personal Evangelism*

WHILE the sermon appears to us the natural and usual method of win- souls, an important place must be rded to the individual and personal eal. Sometimes it prepares the way the preacher, and sometimes its effect en in bringing the pulpit utterances to cus. Its usefulness has been abun- tly proved by experience. There are believers who have not had reason to nowledge their indebtedness to it. God specially honored it, by causing the rd of the bringing of Peter and Na- ael to be included in the Gospel. Both e to Christ in response to a personal tation.

is not surprising that the personal eal is effective. It is direct and usually terested. There are some minds so tituted that a general invitation seems ningless to them. They do not avail nselves of an offer even of worldly , if it is made to any one. Mr. Spur- used to tell the story of a bet made man, that he would stand for an hour prominent place, where thousands ld go by, and offer a five dollar gold e for a quarter, and no man would it. The bet was accepted, the man his place and duly offered the coin, it was not bought. The passers-by no notice of his offer. It is some- so with invitations. A guest person- invited may come, but few would e if the invitation consisted in the announcement that any one would be ome. The personal appeal brings the r home. It requires a definite an- , either accepting or declining, while general invitation may be ignored.

is fact involves a serious responsi- y: If the personal appeal is so effec- tive, the Christian cannot afford to leave it unused. How will he feel at the day of judgment if a relative, a friend, or a neighbor who has no hope says to him then: "You knew the importance of attending to religion; you knew the way of salvation; you had experienced the joy of having Christ for your Saviour; why did you not speak to me about it?" Besides, there is the joy of winning a soul, that none can know but those who experience it. The opportunity of proving our gratitude to Christ for all he has done for us, by bringing another soul to him, is not to be lightly esteemed. Our Lord's own words should inspire us to the work: "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away."

A Pastor Dies in the Pulpit

A WELL-KNOWN Berlin pastor, the Rev. Albrecht Stage, seventy-eight years old, who had preached for more than half a century in the Evangelical Church of the Holy Cross (Lutheran), preached his farewell sermon on Sunday, Sept. 15, in the presence of many dignitaries of State and representatives of royalty. In the last sentences of his oration his hearers were in tears. The aged minister was about to leave the pulpit, when he fell to the floor. A trustee who rushed to his aid found that he was dead. Women became hysterical. After the congregation had been dismissed a physician, after an examination, said the pastor had died of heart disease. The pastor was a great favorite of the Empress, and was chosen by her to promote various benevolent projects in which she is interested.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Book of "Heart Throbs"*

THIS volume is a collection, in prose and verse, of a most attractive array of "the pathetic or humorous little things that have appealed to people, as they sat at the fireside reading newspaper, book or magazine." In this popular sense, it is certainly one of the most notable books issued in recent years, and one that should appeal strongly to a very large constituency. These selections have been made according to a unique method. President Roosevelt sent his favorite selection; so did Admiral Dewey, Speaker Cannon, the late Secretary of State, John Hay, and hundreds of other distinguished public men, some 50,000 Americans, men and women, including almost every name prominent in contemporary literature, art, legislation and commerce. With such a widely-diversified staff of contributors, a plan which has the merit of absolute novelty—the selections necessarily take a range which is large enough to suit every taste.

In the production of Heart Throbs, over $10,000 was expended for contributions, the money being distributed as prizes or awards for the best selections. U. S. Senator Allison and Admiral Dewey officiated as judges, rendering their decisions solely on the basis of the actual merit of the selections sent in. For the ten best selections, each of the ten contributors received "a pile of silver dollars placed flat upon each other, and measuring the exact height of the contributor." There were ten second premiums of $50 each, 20 of $25 each, 100 of $10 each, 200 of $5 each and 500 of $1 each. This ingenious method of rewards was the device of Editor Chapple, of The National Magazine, Boston, Mass., the editor of the volume.

Within the covers of Heart Throbs one finds literary material for the entertainment of young and old, for simple or cultured folks, for the merry or the sad. The stories are the brightest imaginable; the poems are all of them notable, and many of a class that lend themselves to effective reading or recitation. The selections include poems from many nationalities—all in English of course. There are some in dialect, some in the breezy language of the cowboy and the frontier. Some are sublimely descriptive pieces of word-painting; others are full of pathos, and still others have a wit that convulse us with laughter. Practically all the best American writers are represented, and many from other lands. The dear old favorites are not forgotten, and many a scrap-book and old desk has been made to yield up its choicest treasures. Best of all, there is not a trite or common-place page in the whole volume.

Heart Throbs* is a handsome, presentable book of 416 pages, bound in illuminated cloth cover, gilt top; price $1.50, and is issued by the Chapple Publishing Company, 946 Dorchester Avenue, Boston, Mass.

Charles E. Ely, of Peebles, O., has brought out a book of poems of deep religious feeling, collected under the title, Eternal Life in Christ. It is published by the Methodist Book Concern, New York. Pp. 232.

The New York Charities Directory for 1907 contains a new feature worthy of special mention. It gives a name list, making possible the easy identification of all persons connected with the city's charities. Charity Organization Society, New York. Pp. 807.

The Four Gospels and The Psalms in one volume, beautifully printed and bound, suitable for the pocket, is issued by the Oxford University Press, 91 and 93 Fifth Avenue, New York. Price $1. The type is clear and it is printed on fine paper, Venetian morocco binding, limp, with round corners. A little gem of the printer's and bookbinder's art.

Le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, by Alexander Dumas, and edited by L. Sauveur and L. S. Jones, is prepared for the use of the pupil in French. Copious explanatory notes in English are appended. American Book Company, New York, Cincinnati and Chicago. Pp. 190. Price 40 cents.

A biographical study of William McKinley, full of interesting anecdotes, and especially recommended to young people, is given to the public by M. A. Elwood Corning. The book should go far toward "keeping the memory green" of a good and great man. Broadway Publishing Company, New York. Pp. 181. Price $1.25.

The English Men of Letters series, which has attracted the attention of students and litterateurs everywhere, has received a notable addition in a serious and scholarly analysis of the character and work of Shakespeare, written by Walter Raleigh, Professor of English Literature in Oxford University. The Macmillan Company, New York. Pp. 233. Price 75 cents.

Pitman's Cumulative Speller, pp. 112, price 40 cents: and Isaac Pitman's Spanish Shorthand. Pp. 128, price $1.50, are issued by Pitman & Sons, publishers, New York. The first is for the use of business schools and commercial departments, and is a valuable little handbook. The second cannot fail to be extremely helpful to commercial students who use the Spanish language in business correspondence.

Apollo, an Illustrated Manual of the History of Art Throughout the Ages, by S. Reinach, member of the Institute of France. Copiously illustrated. This volume covers a wide range, including the prehistoric art of the cave-dwellers, that of the polished stone and bronze ages, the art of Egypt, Chaldea, Persia and Assyria, the Greek, Etruscan, Romanesque and medieval.

The Windfall, with its background of moonshiners and other mountain people, does not need its author's name attached for readers to recognize that it comes from the pen of Miss Murfree (Charles Egbert Craddock). The varying fortunes of a little show in the towns of the Smoky Mountains are followed with unflagging interest, and several exciting love affairs in which the youthful manager takes part hold the attention. Duffield & Co., New York. Pp. 450. Price $1.50.

There must be a more or less genuine ring in The Seamy Side, or it would not have provoked such columns of adverse comment and furious denial from various representatives of the stage as have appeared in the literary columns of contemporary weeklies. It is "a story of the true conditions of things theatrical," purporting to have been written by "one who has spent twenty years among them." Percy Ives Publishing Co., Boston, Mass. Pp. 308.

Pathways to the Best, a series of twenty-six short sermons on practical topics by Charles L. Goodell, D.D. Among the topics dealt with are "The Alternative of Faith," "A Sure Method With Doubt," "Shirking a Great Duty," "The Modern Pharisee," "The Perils of Middle Life." These are handled by the famous preacher in a bright, vigorous style that holds the reader's attention. Pp. 344. Price $1.20. Published by Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.

Pleased with Paper and Books

Dear Dr. Klopsch: "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" duly received. I purchased this splendid work as a present for my eldest daughter. All members of the family are delighted with it. Seldom, indeed, can so much value be obtained for so small a price. We also regard THE CHRISTIAN HERALD without a peer as a periodical of its class.

HER "BEST FRIEND"

A Woman Thus Speaks of Postum

We usually consider our best friends those who treat us best.

Some persons think coffee a real friend, but watch it carefully awhile and observe that it is one of the meanest of all enemies, for it stabs one while professing friendship.

Coffee contains a poisonous drug—caffeine—which injures the delicate nervous system and frequently sets up disease in one or more organs of the body, if its use is persisted in.

"I had heart palpitation and nervousness for four years and the doctor told me the trouble was caused by coffee. He advised me to leave it off, but I thought I could not," writes a Wisconsin lady.

"On the advice of a friend I tried Postum Food Coffee and it so satisfied me I did not care for coffee after a few days trial of Postum.

"As weeks went by and I continued to use Postum my weight increased from 98 to 118 pounds, and the heart trouble left me. I have used it a year now and am stronger than I ever was. I can hustle up stairs without any heart palpitation, and my nervousness has disappeared.

"My children are very fond of Postum and it agrees with them. My sister liked it when she drank it at my house, but not when she made it at her own home. Now she has learned to make it right, boiling it according to directions, and has become very fond of it. You may use my name if you wish, as I am not ashamed of praising my best friend—Postum."

Unseen Comfort

A. O. Leonard INVENTOR LEONARD'S ANTISEPTIC EAR DRUM

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. I have just gotten out a new Ear Drum that is a great improvement over my original Drum. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

Family Trials

By Mrs. M. Baxter

ISRAEL was in great straits soon after the death of Joshua. They had forsaken God and he punished them by giving them up to the Midianites. Hard pressed under their affliction, the rebellious people found no solace, and no relief from their false gods, and "Israel was greatly impoverished because of the Midianites." It is a terrible thing when the children of God are impoverished through the ungodly; but sure it is that if we are not winning them to the Lord's side, they have power to make us their prey; an unfaithful believer is, morally, the weakest of all beings.

When, at last, the people cried unto him, the Lord answered by sending them a prophet to convict them of their sin. But at the very same time he was preparing them a deliverer. Gideon, one of the younger sons of Joash, was threshing wheat in the wine-press to hide it from the Midianites, when "the angel of the Lord appeared unto him, and said unto him, the Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." Gideon was not surprised to get a message from God; probably as a believer he was alone in his family, and the Lord always has special care for such, and makes up for the want of sympathy around by manifesting himself the more fully and blessedly. But this communication troubled him; he looked at circumstances, and the words of the angel seemed to him a mockery.

God "calleth those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. 4:17). He called Gideon "a mighty man of valor," because he was about to make him one. God's word is creative. When Jesus said to the woman who had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, "Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity" (Luke 13:12), while, as yet, she was bent double, he was pledged to bring it to pass, asking of her only faith to receive the fulfilment of his word. "Go in this thy might"—the might of God's spoken word, the might of a mission commanded by God, and for which God was responsible, but, above all, the might of the Lord with the man.

The Lord had looked upon Gideon, but Gideon, instead of looking upon the Lord, looked upon himself, and began to calculate probabilities of success accordingly: "O my Lord, wherewith shall I save Israel? Behold, my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house." Had Gideon known more of God, he would have seen in his nothingness the greatest claim that God should use him (I. Cor. 1: 26-29). "Wherewith?" Gideon had neither riches, power, influence, nor talent. "Wherewith?" The answer of God was enough. "With me." "Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man." "Wherewith shall I endure the trials which are pressing upon me?" says some oppressed child of God. "Wherewith shall I gain control over the wayward heart of my son?" says an anxious mother. "Wherewith shall I meet the humiliation which the losses in my business have brought upon me?" says a man of business. "Wherewith shall I love the one who has proved himself my greatest enemy?" says another.

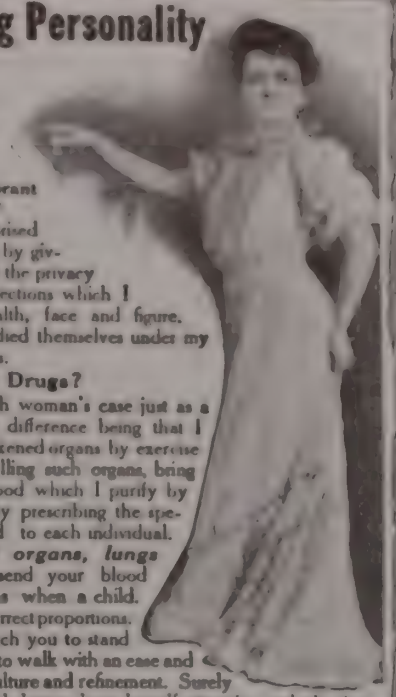
There is one answer to the real seeker: "With me." "Surely, I will be (nay, I am) with thee." Gideon was a timid soul, and, in order to be sure of the ground he stood on, he asked a sign—viz., that his offering might be accepted. When he had presented his offering, and the angel of the Lord brought forth fire out of the rock to devour it, and then departed out of his sight, Gideon still continued communing with God, and built an altar unto him.

But now that his faith was established, Gideon must begin to act faith. At the command of the Lord, he must commence by overthrowing idolatry at home, in his father's house.

Health, Charming Personality Good Figure

Grace at 20
Young at 40
Energetic at 70

If you will work with me for vibrant health and a Good Figure



MANY a woman has surprised her husband and friends by giving 15 minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to special directions which I give to her for the care of health, face and figure. Over 25,000 women have studied themselves under my direction in the past five years.

Are You Tired of Drugs?

I use no drugs. I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercise for nerves and muscles controlling such organs, bring a good circulation of warm blood which I purify by teaching correct breathing and by prescribing the special diet, bathing, etc., adapted to each individual. I strengthen all your vital organs, lungs heart, nerve centers, and send your blood bounding through your veins as when a child.

I Develop or Reduce Your Figure to correct proportions. I teach you to stand and to walk with an ease and dignity which at once bespeak culture and refinement. Surely it is every woman's privilege and duty to keep herself attractive and pleasing.

How to Stand and Walk When you request details about my lessons, I send you, Free, a booklet showing you how to stand and walk correctly, with a card of correct poise for your dressing table.

Miss Cocroft at Her Desk.

What My Pupils Say of My Work

I wish every nervous teacher could know what benefit is to be derived from your physical culture. I am writing you to-day because I have reduced exactly 100 lbs. I look ten years younger. My biliousness is entirely relieved. Just think how I have gained, since I began with you, from 113 to 137½ lbs. in one year. My catarrh and lungs are much better and my body, which was a lump, crushed structure, is actually beginning to look like your picture of correct poise. My head is steady, the confused feeling having gone. It is the best money ever spent for myself. You have made me feel like a new woman. My stomach is strong and I have had no neuralgia for some time.

Personal Instructions Write me fully, also letting me know your faults of figure, etc. I will make a personal study of your case and will let you know whether I can help you. Your letter will be held in strict confidence. I never publish letters without special permission, though I can send you hundreds of testimonials from women I have helped, who have given me permission to show their letters.

SUSANNA COCROFT, Dept. 18, 57 Washington St., Chicago

Author of "Growth in Silence," "Character as Expressed in the Limbs" etc.

The following are some of the elements I correct. For letters stating age and general description, write me which treatment needs it most in your case. If you are suffering from any other organic trouble and I can help you, tell me, with full description, and I will be glad to help you.

Give me your full name and address, writing very clearly, please.

Training Christian Workers

By A. P. FITT

IT may be true that college men are not looking to the ministry as a life-work in such large numbers now as formerly; but it is a significant fact that all over the land God is still calling men from the farm and factory, the office and store, and in not a few cases from the legal and medical professions, and is filling them with such a passion for souls that no secular work can ever satisfy them, and they are willing to lay down their trade or profession at any sacrifice in order to give their whole time and strength to definite Christian work.

During the past year at The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, 332 men and 221 women were enrolled as students, a total of 553. They represented between 30 and 40 denominations, about 40 States and 10 foreign countries. In addition, the Evening Department of the Institute enrolled 305 young men and women in the night classes, while 367 more were enrolled in the Correspondence Department, representing 26 States and 3 foreign lands.

Many of the students made great sacrifices financially and in other ways to give their lives to Christian service. One man forfeited his share in a large fortune made in the liquor business. Another refused an offer of $150 per month as a mining engineer. Another, who has for several years earned $7,500 a year as a traveling salesman, resigned his position in order to devote all his time to Christian work. One man resisted God's call for fifteen years, and finally had to surrender. He is at the Institute to-day at the age of 31, and expects to spend his life as a foreign missionary. Another was called to the ministry at the age of 18, but refused to obey the call and took up various kinds of work. All the time, however, he was conscious of his disobedience, and God rebuked him in many ways. Finally he yielded, entered the Institute, and for the first time in many years enjoyed a clear conscience. He went to a theological seminary this fall, and gives promise of great usefulness in the ministry. Perhaps this is one secret why men are not coming forward for the ministry: God is calling them as of old, but they refuse to obey, and hence the lack of workers.

The passing years have demonstrated the timeliness and sanity of Mr. Moody's foresight and planning. The principles adopted when he founded the Institute in 1886 have not changed. One great object is in view, namely, soul-winning. There is no desire to turn out mere professional Bible teachers or evangelists or other workers; but every effort is made to send forth consecrated men and women who shall be theoretically and practically trained to win and build up souls by means of evangelistic work, Bible teaching and other proper modes of Christian effort.

Never before in the history of the Institute have so many applications been received for trained workers. Churches and mission boards are continually calling for men and women who have a practical knowledge of the Bible and the different methods of actual Christian work which students receive in the two years' course of training.

For the fall term the Institute has already enrolled 332 men and 125 women, a large increase over previous years. Since no tuition fees are charged the Institute is dependent upon outside gifts to meet these needs.

Entrenched Foes*

HOW joyful, how proud must have been the little army that followed the devoted leader in his attack on the Midianites, when it returned victorious! A modern parallel was Garibaldi's assault on Naples. It seemed almost beyond belief that with his insignificant band of red-shirted followers he could have driven the King of Naples into exile, and wrested from his grasp the kingdom of the Sicilies. Every one regarded his expedition as the extreme of foolhardiness. But the whole government was rotten and it collapsed before an enthusiastic patriot. Men whom every one has known gloried in having a share in that campaign which set two kingdoms free and contributed in no small degree to the unity of Italy. Men who believe, who are enthused, who are ready to die for a cause, accomplish results that the ancients called by the name of miracles.

It is inconceivable that our own land should ever fall into servitude or need a deliverer like Gideon or Garibaldi. An opportunity such as they had is denied to us or our descendants; but there are other foes that can be overcome only by such men as they. How it would stir the blood of heroes to be told that a thousand citizens of the United States had been slaughtered! How it would arouse the manly feeling of every true citizen to hear that American women had been stripped of their possessions and condemned to toil in poverty all their days! Yet the liquor traffic, the gambling curse, and the demon of lust are doing that very thing. We cannot walk through the streets of any great city without seeing the victims. There is scarcely a family that has not in its near or remote connections some one who has fallen into the toils. The enemy is firmly entrenched in its ill-gotten wealth; it has among its defenders men mighty in political influence, and against those ramparts assault seems hopeless. Such men as those who followed Gideon, alone can hope for success. They must be men with unfaltering faith in God; men who do not count their own numbers nor the number of the foe; men intent only on delivering their beloved land from the triple curse. Future generations, delivered from the evils, will look back with homage on the men who dared and who sacrificed themselves in the great fight, and will hold their names in reverence for all time.

* Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for November 17. "Wanted, Men for Gideon's Band." Judges 7: 2-7.

"Beyond Expectation"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The books, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" received. They are beyond my expectation. Am delighted. Always have a good word for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. With best wishes, J. BOYER BURRISS.

"LIKE MAGIC"

New Food Makes Wonderful Changes

When a man has suffered from dyspepsia so many years that he can't remember when he had a natural appetite, and then finds relief, he may be excused for saying "it acts like magic."

When it is a simple wholesome food instead of any one of a large number of so-called remedies in the form of drugs, he is more than ever likely to feel as though a sort of miracle has been performed.

A Chicago man, in the delight of restored digestion, puts it in this way:

"Like magic, fittingly describes the manner in which Grape-Nuts relieved me of poor digestion, coated tongue and loss of appetite, of many years' standing.

"I tried about every medicine that was recommended to me, without relief. Then I tried Grape-Nuts on the suggestion of a friend. By the time I had finished the fourth package, my stomach was all right, and for the past two months, I have been eating with a relish, anything set before me. That is something I had been unable to do previously for years.

"I am stronger than ever and I consider the effects of Grape-Nuts on a weak stomach as something really wonderful. It builds up the entire body as well as the brain and nerves." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

The Rapid Industrial Growth of Trenton, America's Historic City, Affords an Unusually Favorable Real Estate Investment

EVERY patriotic citizen of the United States knows about Trenton, the centre of our Revolutionary history when the struggle for our national independence was fought and won—at that time the vantage point of battle—now the greatest manufacturing city of the East.

This famous capital city of the wealthy State of New Jersey (a State entirely free from debt), being the natural junction point of trunk line railroads, canals and vast shipping interests that centre here, has attracted

Industries of International Fame

More than $40,000,000.00 is invested in Trenton's industries. They now employ over 25,000 people, who are paid a little over $1,000,000.00 a month. This does not include the large number of State officers and thousands of employes of stores and dealers.

Trenton's products are used in all parts of the world.

The Roebling steel wire and cable plant, covering over 35 acres—the largest plant of its kind in the world—built the famous Brooklyn Bridge, Niagara Suspension Bridge and other great cable bridges of the world. Nearly 6,000 people are employed in this one plant on a payroll exceeding $500,000.00 a month.

The Trenton Potteries Co. employ over 5,000 people and produced over $7,000,000.00 worth of goods in 1906.

Trenton's potteries produce almost $12,000,000.00 a year.

There are 10 rubber manufacturers here; the largest Linoleum and Oilcloth Works in the world, with hundreds of other important industries that manufacture everything from the famous Trenton water cracker to a ship's anchor.

The unusually favorable shipping facilities by river, canals and railroads, bring new industries here every year and keeps all of the old ones, which are constantly expanding.

Within the past six months a number of important manufacturers have come here from other cities. This steady industrial growth has brought a corresponding increase of population. The city is growing rapidly, following the new industries in an easterly direction along the Pennsylvania Railroad to a healthy residence section, with beautiful wide streets, adjoining the immense Pennsylvania Railroad car shops, where 600 men are employed. The thousands of workers in the East End look to East Trenton Heights as their natural residence section. It is within a stone's throw of a large number of Trenton's most important industrial plants and within easy access of all by good trolley service.

For the man seeking profitable, steady employment 330 days in the year, there is nothing better anywhere. And since it offers a good home for the very people who make a great city like Trenton possible, there can be nothing better for investment.

Homes erected here will have the advantage of all city conveniences—gas, water, sewer, electric light, mail delivery, good schools, churches of all denominations, with refined, healthful surroundings. Every lot fronts on a beautiful wide street. All street improvements, even to the planting of shade trees, have been made by the Company. All lots are sold under permanent restrictions for residence or business, but no factories will be allowed on any portion of this tract.

There are nearly 10,000 people now employed in the large industries within 5 minutes of East Trenton Heights. This famous Linoleum and Oilcloth Works is one of them and will give you an idea of the enormous plants here.

Hon. E.C. Hutchinson, Road Commissioner of New Jersey, is one of the best informed real estate authorities in Trenton. He has spent the greater part of his life here and is a heavy real estate owner himself. He says:

I consider East Trenton Heights one of the best subdivisions in Trenton. Acreage around Trenton has advanced in recent years to three and four times the price you paid for the tract you are now subdividing.

I have been much interested in watching the increase in value of real estate in Trenton for the past 30 years. I have noted that there has been a greater increase within the past 10 years by reason of the numerous industrial developments in Trenton. The old plants are enlarging and expanding, and new ones are being built at a surprising rate.

I believe you are most fortunate in having secured East Trenton Heights at a figure that will enable you to offer building lots at a price not possible for similar property so well located, and feel sure a large number of Trenton people will invest and build in East Trenton Heights.

Very truly yours,

June 28, 1907. {Signed} E. C. HUTCHINSON.

This map shows the relative position of Trenton to the principal cities of the East. A natural manufacturing centre.

Judging from the rapid increase in the value of Trenton real estate during the last few years, the present price of these lots will seem ridiculously low in a very short time.

This is perhaps the last opportunity you will ever have to secure lots in East Trenton Heights at present prices—$55, $75, $85 and $95 each.

Corner lots are $15 extra, sold only with 2 adjoining lots.

These prices are subject to a discount of 10 per cent. for all cash, or the lots may be purchased on small payments of $1 down and $1 weekly per lot.

There will be no taxes until Jan. 1, 1909.
No interest.
No mortgages.
No charge for deed.
Free and perfect title guarantee, and Free deed to your heirs if you die before payments are completed.
Lots all around this section have more than doubled during the past six months.
The low price of East Trenton Heights lots is possible because the property was acquired by the company developing it before the city trolley was extended to it—ahead of improvements and building of factories.

"Buy All the Land You Can Carry in a Live Manufacturing City" is safe advice to act on. Building lots in a manufacturing city afford absolute safety and sure profit. The growth of the industries already here and the hundreds of new ones coming bring a steady stream of population and demand for more homes. Instead of increasing by a family or two at a time, hundreds of new families are added each year.

Trenton's population has increased enormously during the past 10 years. Hundreds of new homes are being erected to take care of it.

Houses convenient to the manufactories rent well and sell readily. To help us meet this crying need for more homes we are offer-

Over 350 per cent. Profit in 5 Years

Here are a few examples of [illegible] made in Trenton Real Estate during recent years.

$4[illegible] invested in [illegible] and Broad streets has grown to $[illegible].

A property sold on East State street five years ago for $[illegible] is now worth $[illegible].

The recent transfer of a North Broad street property shows an increase in value from $1[illegible] to $[illegible].

Two transfers on East State street show an increase of over 350 per cent. within the past five years.

These are only a few of the many cases that are quoted from official State records.

All of these properties are within 15 minutes of East Trenton Heights.

East Trenton Heights "Makes Good"

Eight of the first ten Trenton people who examined the property bought from two to ten lots each.

One New York investor bought six lots by mail. After he saw the property he immediately bought four more.

A man from Lewistown, Pa., bought three lots by mail, came on to see what we had selected for him and bought nine more.

A New England man bought thirty lots on which to erect houses to rent.

The enthusiastic letters we are constantly receiving from people who visit East Trenton Heights proves that it more than makes good every claim we have made for it.

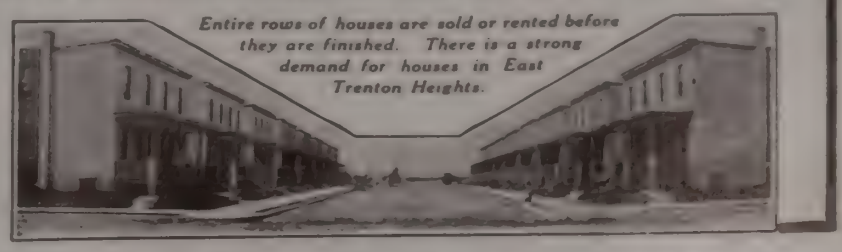
Commence to Build Your Fortune With a Dollar

All great fortunes had a small beginning. You have read of it lots of times, but never thought you could do it. But you can. You perhaps know of somebody who took up a piece of real estate a few years ago that he has since sold at a big profit, or has built on it, and now simply collects his rents. You may think that was just plain luck. It was luck to find the piece of ground that his judgment and foresight told him would be profitable. That kind of luck you can share in. The kind of luck that has made the greatest fortunes in the United States—fortunes that are each year growing larger without any effort or worry on the part of the owners. The kind of luck that will make your succeeding generations independent.

This is an opportunity to save and invest in a live, growing city such as you may never have again.

If you cannot visit Trenton now to make a personal selection, write for booklet, full views of Trenton, with maps and prices, or put your name and address as directed below and send to us with $1 to hold the desired number of lots until you can investigate further.

You will have to act at once. This is a small tract and will go quickly.



Entire rows of houses are sold or rented before they are finished. There is a strong demand for houses in East Trenton Heights.

"Beware of the man of one book," even if that book is the Bible, for he does not truly understand even his one book. For controversy or understanding, teaching or learning, the minimum indispensable and much else very helpful is among the list here given.

A SPLENDID NEW ADDITION:

That invaluable classic, by a great missionary forty-five years resident in Syria, Dr. W. M. Thomson's "THE LAND AND THE BOOK."

Facile princeps among books on the modern Holy Land as illuminating the ancient and the Bible, never losing its charm to read or its value for reference. The gem of any Sunday School Library, and a most valuable and pleasurable book of travel, aside from religious interest. Three volumes, 1992 pages; 6 maps; hundreds of beautiful and well-chosen illustrations, over a hundred full-page; a genuine and authentic Palestine Album. Originally $12.00; now offered, when full set is purchased, at little over ONE-FIFTH that. Cheapened only in price; and maps much improved, printed on tough bond paper and guaranteed never to crack across.

CRUDEN'S COMPLETE CONCORDANCE

By Alexander Cruden, M.A. 756 pages. Former price $1.50.

Without such a work the student or teacher is simply helpless. "Scripture is the best interpreter of Scripture," and even the riches of the Bible are half useless if you cannot tell where to find them.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET & BROWN'S BIBLE COMMENTARY TWO VOLS.

By Robert Jamieson, D.D., St. Paul's, Glasgow; Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., St. Cuthbert's, York; and David Brown, D.D., Professor of Theology, Aberdeen. 1380 pages. Former price $9.00.

A complete commentary on the Old and New Testaments; a massive storehouse of notes, authoritatively learned yet perfectly lucid, concise but sufficiently full for practical use and rich in suggestiveness, elucidating passages not clear to apprehension, historical allusions, unfamiliar customs, and so on.

Rev. J. H. Vincent, Bishop M. E. Church: "It deserves a place on the table of every Bible student."

SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

Edited by William Smith, LL.D., Classical Examiner of London University. 1024 pages. Former price $4.50.

The best work of the kind in the language. A great standard classic, too indispensable to need description and never superseded by any later one. Ministers, teachers, Sunday School superintendents and Bible readers generally need their Smith only less than they do their Cruden.

FAUSSET'S CRITICAL AND EXPOSITORY BIBLE CYCLOPEDIA

By Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., of St. Cuthbert's, York. 750 three-column pages; 600 illustrations. Former price $5.00.

This great work is a masterpiece of compressed riches. It represents seven years' labor by the author and contains 3,700 articles of enormous variety, concise yet complete and abundantly thorough. It sets forth briefly and suggestively those doctrinal and experiential truths contained in the written Word itself.

J. W. Bashford, D.D., President of Ohio Wesleyan University: "It is a most admirable aid. I hope ten thousand teachers will use it in the next six months."

KITTO'S ILLUSTRATED BIBLE HISTORY

By Rev. John Kitto, D.D., F.S.A. 735 double-column pages; 220 engravings. Former price $4.50.

A brilliant work of immense popularity, filling up the gaps in the Scripture narrative, completing it in a rounded historic unity to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and clothing the whole scene and personages with vivid life. Over 100,000 copies sold and the demand unabated testify to its enduring merits.

EDERSHEIM'S LIFE AND TIMES of JESUS THE MESSIAH TWO VOLS.

By Alfred Edersheim, M.A., Oxon., D.D., Lecturer at the University of Oxford. The Authorized American edition. 1524 pages. Former price $6.00.

A full and admirable portrait of the society, life and intellectual and religious development of the Palestine of the time of Christ, to serve as a background for His own portrait; by a world-famous master of Jewish writings and customs. Virtually a historical commentary on the Four Gospels.

The Sunday School Times: "It is positively refreshing to read a life of the Saviour which is critical in the best and truest sense of the word, and is biblical at the same time."

CONYBEARE & HOWSON'S LIFE AND EPISTLES of ST. PAUL

By Rev. W. J. Conybeare, M.A., of Cambridge, and J. S. Howson, D.D., of Liverpool. 917 pages; many fine illustrations, maps, coins, etc. Former price $4.50.

A splendid work of enduring popularity and authority; key to the origin and growth of Christianity. No other compares with it for a lifelike picture of the great Apostle and the work he did, an acute and illuminating general commentary on his writings and a style at once full of fine scholarship and of literary charm.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

Translated from the Original Greek by Wm. Whiston, M.A. 978 pages. Former price $4.00.

The priceless writings of the greatest Jewish leader and statesman in the generation after Christ: History and Antiquities of the Jews; the Roman-Jewish War, which stamped out the Jewish nationality in blood and fire, destroying Jerusalem and scattering the Jewish people; Against Apion; discourse on Hades; various dissertations, tables of weights, measures, and coins.

SANFORD'S CONCISE CYCLOPEDIA of RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE

Edited by Rev. E. B. Sanford, D.D. Historical, Biographical and Geographical, Theological and Practical. 985 pages, beautifully illustrated. Former price $3.00.

A surprising treasury of information regarding Church and Bible History, Names, Places and Customs, Creeds and Sects, Theologians and Scholars, the Early Church, the Story of the Reformation, the various Young People's Societies, Cathedrals, Churches, etc., etc.

GILBERT'S 3,000 SELECTED QUOTATIONS

By Josiah Gilbert. Introduction by Chas. S. Robinson, LL.D. 681 pages. Former price $2.00.

A gold mine to speakers and writers. Pithy and eloquent passages from the literature of all ages, with complete index of authors and subjects. Undenominational but evangelical. Preachers, teachers and students will be charmed with these terse utterances, which clearly and forcibly express or apply some religious truth.

Tell all your friends of this splendid Bargain and get them to order with you.

THE DAUGHTER OF JEPHTHAH

Questions and Answers

H. L. C., Manifest, La. The question has arisen as to whether there are any people in the cities of this State who have not heard the name of Christ.

We think it unlikely. There may be out-of-the-way localities in any State where the Gospel is not preached and where there are few or no religious advantages; but, with the exception of infants or imbeciles, it is unthinkable that there should be any in our land who have never heard the Saviour's name.

S. W., Acton, Mass. Please let me know what the late Queen Victoria's name was both before marriage to the late Prince Albert and after?

The title and name of Queen Victoria were the same before and after her marriage. A queen does not take her husband's name, although she takes his title if he is of higher rank. For example, the new Queen of Spain is Queen Victoria of Spain, and not Queen Alfonso. Queen Victoria, like other members of ancient royal families, had no last name. First names are used, followed by the name of the country or principality over which they rule or over which at one time royal or titled ancestors held sway. Queen Victoria's ancestry dates back of the time when surnames came into use. Her father was the Duke of Kent. She was descended remotely from the Guelphs. Prince Albert was descended from the Counts of Wettin, and as their titles go back before the middle ages, he also had no last name. Modern royal and imperial houses in some cases have family names. The royal Swedish house, for example, is the Bernadottes. Among the lower classes in Europe family names in some remote places were not used until two or three centuries ago.

Reader, York New Salem, Pa. 1. According to Christ's teaching is it justifiable to kill a man in self-defense? 2. According to the view of the majority of theologians, should capital punishment be abolished?

1. No. He taught his followers to refrain from all forms of violence, under all circumstances, and illustrated his teaching by his own example. 2. They are divided; but a large and increasing number favor its abolition.

M. B., Dayton, O. Where can I find the essential facts concerning Dr. Zamenhof's invention of Esperanto, the new language? We are greatly interested here in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S forthcoming series of Esperanto lessons.

Dr. Zamenhof was born at Bielostok in Lithuania, Russia, in 1859, and educated at a gymnasium and the university. He studied English and was delighted to find in its comparatively simple grammar the clue to the simplification of language generally. In 1878 he began work on the construction of a new language, but his first pamphlet did not appear until 1887. For years he was regarded as a crank; but his ideas took root, and in ten years more they were steadily gaining in public favor, and Esperanto Associations were formed with the British Esperanto Association as a central medium. There are now over 300 Esperanto groups or societies distributed in different countries, and the movement is constantly extending. Esperanto has been added to the curriculum of many schools in France and England, and examinations in the new language are now held by the London Chamber of Commerce and the National Union of Teachers. A World's Esperanto Congress is held every year. This year it met at Cambridge, England, and in the same week Esperanto services were held in all the churches.

E. R. R., Madison, Wis. Is the song of the "Old Oaken Bucket" a parody on "The Old-fashioned Bible," or vice versa?

The "Old Oaken Bucket" is not a parody. It was written by John Howard Payne, the American poet. His home on Long Island, N. Y., where the "moss-covered bucket" really "hung in the well," has been recently purchased by a gentleman living in New York City, and the homestead is to be preserved as a memorial of the author. Payne was born in 1792. In 1851 he was appointed United States consul at Tunis. He died there April 10, 1852. We never heard of the second song, but should judge from the title that it is adapted from the first.

J. C., Sarver, Pa. What are the "first" and "second" referred to in Heb. 10: 9?

Not the book, as you appear to imagine, but the systems of sacrifice. "He taketh away the first," that is, all the long and complicated system of offerings prescribed in the Levitical law, which had served their purpose. "That he may establish the second," that is, the atonement which Christ offered once for all. The writer of the epistle is addressing Jews and he wants them to conceive of the progressive revelation. He represents Christianity in the light most attractive to them of a step forward. As the kindergarten teacher finds his pupils growing out of his system, he does not tell them that what they had learned was useless, but that they must now proceed to something for which his system had been a preparation. So the Jew was invited to discard the law and proceed to the Gospel.

A. F. R., Franklin, Neb. Was Jericho ever rebuilt after its fall? If so, was Joshua's curse (Joshua 6: 26) fulfilled?

Yes, it was rebuilt and was a considerable town in our Lord's time (see Luke 19: 1). The writer of the book of Kings says that the builder was Hiel, the Bethelite, and that he lost his two sons Abiram and Segub at the two stages of building as threatened by Joshua. (See 1. Kings 16: 34.)

Abyssinia a Constitutional Country

ONE more ancient monarchy, following the example of Persia, has fallen into line as a constitutional government. Menelik II., Emperor of Abyssinia, has decided to grant a constitution to his Empire, and has appointed a Cabinet, with Ministers of Foreign Affairs, Justice, Finance, Commerce and War. He has a heterogeneous dominion which, by sheer force of genius and vigor, he has hitherto kept united under his sway. Abyssinia proper has an area of about 250,000 square miles (a little less than Texas), and an estimated population of about eight millions. They vary considerably in race. On the northeast, the people are of a Semitic type, with a code of laws based on the Mosaic law. On the southeast, the people are more akin to the negro. The Galla tribes on the south are partly pagan, partly Mohammedan and partly Christian.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, there were four kings ruling separate dependencies, but Theodore, the most progressive of them, made himself supreme. In 1854 he had subdued the Galla and Shoa, and was crowned King of Abyssinia. He was a shrewd monarch, but his cruelty and tyranny made him unpopular. He threw the English consul and several other Englishmen into prison, and an army was sent against him, and in the battle that ensued he was slain. John, who succeeded him, was slain by the Mahdists in 1889. The way was then open for the ambitious King of Shoa to gain supreme power, and he was crowned as Menelik II. He boasts that he comes of illustrious ancestry. His paternal ancestor, he claims, was King Solomon, and his maternal ancestress was the Queen of Sheba. He has proved, on the whole, a sagacious monarch, and he showed his warlike qualities by defeating the Italian forces at Adowa in 1896. He is a warm admirer of European civilization, and has introduced the railroad and the telegraph into his dominions. He has now taken another step forward in abandoning despotism and making himself a constitutional monarch.

Reader, Atlanta, Ga. What is the Gothenburg system of managing the liquor traffic, to which allusion is often made?

It is a system devised to prevent a dealer gaining money from the sale of intoxicating liquor. The business is placed in the hands of certain reputable persons in every town, who receive the proceeds of sales. They deduct a small proportion to cover the interest on the capital invested. The balance is divided as follows: One-fifth to the municipal authorities, one-tenth to the local agricultural society and seven-tenths to the general government. Until this year the municipal authorities had seven-tenths of the proceeds, but the amount has been reduced, so as to prevent them encouraging drinking, to reduce local taxation.

J. W. B., Wisdom, Ky. 1. How can Satan take away the seed from the heart as Jesus said (Mark 4: 15)? 2. Why did Bartimeus cast away his garment before coming to Jesus (Mark 10: 50)?

1. It may be done in many ways. By idle gossip immediately after hearing the word, by distracting the attention, by suggestions of evil, or in many other ingenious ways. 2. Jesus was surrounded by a crowd, as Bartimeus knew by the noise. The loose flowing outer robe worn in those days might have embarrassed him in reaching Jesus, among so many. The blessing he had asked and which now seemed near, was too great to be jeopardized, and he cast the garment off that it might not hinder him in getting near Jesus.

Subscriber, Oshkosh, Wis. 1. When Peter was directed to kill and eat of the animals in the great sheet, was he not disobedient in not doing so, seeing as his reply showed (Acts 10: 14) that he recognized the voice as the voice of God? 2. Do you suppose that the Antediluvians were more wicked than any generation since their day?

1. Peter was in a trance, as the account shows. The vision was sent to teach him not to despise any man, even though he might be a Gentile. It was to prepare him for the visit of the messengers of Cornelius. We cannot imagine actual obedience being required. A man could not kill and eat in a dream. Besides, cooking would be necessary. The vision was sent to elicit the reply he gave, which revealed his disposition. The reproof he received taught him how he should behave to a man whom God had stirred up to seek him. 2. We have no means of knowing what the sins of the Antediluvians were. That they were very bad is obvious. Christ's reference to them (Matt. 24: 38) seems to imply sensuality, which agrees with the account in Genesis. But there is no basis for comparison with other generations.

G. D. T., Elroy, Wis. What did Christ mean by telling the woman of Samaria that men must worship God in spirit and in truth?

That the worship must be sincere, not an observance of ceremonies, as was common at the time. Not the worship of any visible object, but a worship of spirit offered to Spirit. The woman's question was as to the place of worship and Christ's answer was intended to disabuse her mind of ideas of place and to teach her that anywhere and everywhere, and not alone in the Temple, men might worship God.

Miscellaneous

Reader, Me. Use foolscap size.

M. H. B., Allentown, Pa. We have been unable to find out anything concerning the person you mentioned.

A. A., San Antonio, Tex. We have no further facts in the matter than those which we published.

Jesse D., Albany, N. Y. Yes: under the Finnish constitution, women are equally eligible with men to public office.

Subscriber, Ashland, O. The law on the subject of widows' rights differs in different States. Better consult an Ohio lawyer.

B. B., Des Moines, Ia. Russia has the highest birth rate of any country in Europe. The births in the Czar's empire, according to recent statistics, reached last year 2,230,000.

P. H. W., Cumberland Gap, Tenn. We have been unable to find out anything concerning the relic. Perhaps the War Department, Washington, D. C., can give you some information.

R. H. A., Freeburg, Ill. It does not seem to be a matter in which outsiders should interfere. Doubtless the church will do what it believes to be for the best. Why not lay the whole matter before your pastor and ask his advice?

G. D. D., Hampton Falls, N. H. Your theory is an interesting one, but we believe that the one given in THE MAIL BAG some time ago is generally held by scientific men. The real reason of course is not known.

J. W. H., Atlanta, Texas. Ships can usually be seen from another ship at the distance of fifteen miles. A person standing at the edge of the water can see the same distance. The surface of the land and the ocean are not on a level, so the problem could not be worked out with any practical results.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE HOME

FOR A "FARTHEST NORTH" MISSION

Christian Schmitt, of the Moravian Station at Nain, to Found One in the Frozen Interior of Baffin's Land

"N the records of missionary enterprise and exploration, there is much to thrill and inspire the sympathetic reader. From time to time letters have appeared in these pages from brave, consecrated ssion workers in remote parts of the globe, where, from even the commonest comforts of civilization, y are carrying the Gospel standard to the tribes and oples to whom the name of Jesus is unknown. nether in the heart of Africa, deserts of Arabia, the islands the South Seas, the "sealed id" of Tibet, or among the glected tribes of the upper azon of South America, the k of these Gospel pioneers is e of peril and privation, such none can fully appreciate e those who have been in ilar fields.

Our readers are already somet at familiar with the work of missionaries in the Far rth. They will doubtless re- l with some degree of interest letters that have appeared these columns from the Lab- lor missionaries, and more ticularly from Rev. Christian mitt, of the Moravian station Nain. When Mr. Schmitt, o was accustomed to making g missionary journeys by g-sled, lost his traveling equip- t a year ago in an accident, umber of good-hearted friends tributed a sufficient sum, and ew and stronger sled was built him in New York, and for- ded to him by the little mis- steamer Harmony, which kes one round trip to the ely northern station every r. In all likelihood, the sled now reached him safely, and a commission, to his great satisfaction and comfort. n the following letter, Mr. Schmitt tells how the pel picket lines are being steadily advanced in the thern land of ice and snow. He also tells of a bold ject to push the lines far within the Arctic Circle, to establish in Baffin's Land a corps of workers and a station which would probably be the "Farthest North" Christian mission in the world.

"KILLINEK, LABRADOR.

"Dear Dr. Klopsch: I write to you from the northern extremity of our mission station, as I have been stranded here at Cape Chudley ever since August 31. It was not my desire to stay so long at the Cape; but it came about quite unexpectedly in this way:

Home of a Native Family, Baffin's Land

"Dr. Grenfell was kind enough to call on us at Nain, on August 17, and as he expressed his intention to go north as far as Cape Chudley, I was glad to accept the invitation to come with him. On our arrival here, I found it necessary to stay, as our own mission vessel, the Harmony, was due in a short time. Our ship, however, has not turned up yet, and we begin to think that something may have happened to her. My prolonged stay has opened up new fields and problems, in which I desire to interest you and your kind CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

"Our newest mission station on the Labrador coast is Killinek. It is situated on the Ungava Bay side, and is within ten miles of Cape Chudley proper. We began operations here in 1906. Last year our Mission Board sent a new church and house, which were under construction when I arrived here. As Mr. Waldmann, the resident missionary, was alone in the work and had only a few Eskimos to help him, I was glad to assist, as it was desirable to have the new buildings finished before the cold weather set in.

"We were, however, making slow progress and felt somewhat cast down, when a Canadian government vessel, the steamship Arctic, arrived in our harbor, coming from the north. The captain, as well as others on board, saw our need and did all they could to help our work. During the following days, with the help of the ship's carpenter and others, the church and house were rapidly completed, and we held our first service in the new building on September 15. How marvelously God provides, even in these neglected regions!

"On board the Arctic were a number of Christian men, including Hon. James Duncan, collector of customs for the Canadian government. These gentlemen have visited during the past year the regions north of Hudson Bay and the Straits. They have seen the Eskimos in their pitiable condition, and the stories they have told us about them have made our hearts burn within us to go and help them. To us their cry, "Come over and help us," is loud and urgent.

"Let me tell you, though in a poor and incomplete

THE AMERICAN PULPIT

A SERMON BY

Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

THE REAR-GUARD

TEXT—Isaiah 52: 12

"The God of Israel will be your rereward"

AN old officer said to me some time ago, "Though the details of fighting may change, yet, after all, the great formations of battle lines from time immemorial have been practically the same. The battles of the Civil War were specimens of this formation. First comes the forward line of skirmishers. These sharpshooters are scattered abroad about three hundred yards in front of the main body of men. These are the men who spy out the land and receive the first attack and give the main troops time to prepare for action. Then comes the main line of battle. Shoulder to shoulder the soldiers are formed, sometimes in one rank, sometimes in two and even three ranks deep. This line stretches away, with its right and left flanks firmly entrenched. Then, back of the main line of battle, is what we old soldiers used to call the reserve force."

The Station of the Rear-guard

"What is the purpose of that reserve force?" I asked. "Well," answered the old soldier, "the general in command with his field-glass takes his position far to the rear, on some eminence overlooking the entire army. There he watches the mobilizing of the enemy. He sees where the attacks are to be made. Then when the crash comes and the charging troops are hurled against any one part of his lines and that part threatens to give way the commanding general sends forward his reserve force. Then the wavering troops are steadied and the battle goes on, until at last the victory is won by one side or the other."

"Well," I answered, "the main purpose of this 'Rear-guard,' or 'Reserve Force' is to keep a large part of the troops back of the main line of battle, to reinforce any part of that line which is being overwhelmed by too great an attacking force?" "Just that and nothing else," my old friend said. "It is absolutely imperative for a line of battle to be kept straight. If one part is defeated, all will be defeated. Thus, in order to help the wavering troops of one part of his line, the commanding general keeps some of his best soldiers by his side in a reserve force, to send them forth to succor those who are being worsted in the conflict." "Ah," I answered, "this is the first time I have ever had a clear conception of what Isaiah meant in a familiar passage." In the fifty-second chapter he exhorts the Church to go forth and do the work God has given her to do, and he encourages her with the promise: "For ye shall not go out with haste nor by flight; for the Lord will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rereward." That means the Lord God Almighty will be a reserve force for his people in the hard struggle of life. Now I want to show you how God manipulates his "rear-guard" so as to help us in our fight against sin and in our battles for the redemption of the world.

I realize, in the first place, that it would be useless to have a rear-guard for an army, unless at the same time you have a commanding general, who is in absolute control of all the different parts of the army. That general must not only be in supreme command, but he must be able to detail every individual soldier of every body of troops to just the position he would have him take upon the battlefield. As the chess-player can move forward his queen and knights and pawns, in order to overthrow the stronghold of his antagonist, so the commanding general must have absolute control of all the army, or else there is no practical use for a rear-guard. And it is the general who has the most perfect control of all his troops who can make the most effective use of his rear-guard.

Ready for Service

But there is another fact which forces itself upon me. God not only details us to certain positions in the line of battle, but he expects us to bear our part well in the heat of the struggle, and be ready to suffer with fortitude in the conflict. He does not send us forth as Christian soldiers for a dress parade. He does not want us to while away the pleasant summer days in a seaside encampment. He places us upon the line of battle to fight in his name. The Christian soldier, like every other good soldier, must struggle and suffer and bear the pangs of hunger and thirst and prove his valor by the honor marks of many wounds. The Christian life is not a time for sport. It is an opportunity for conflict, and for warfare, and for attacks, and for bleeding wounds, and for suffering and agony, and for grave-trenches. And yet to hear some people talk you would never suppose that Christ spoke with any meaning when he said, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth, but a sword." Or in that other passage when he said, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my name's sake." Does that imply that God is expecting his Christian soldiers to have an easy time and not suffer in the strife of a bloody battlefield? What commanding general ever placed his soldiers in line of battle, unless he intended them to fight?

Furthermore, does he not place his strongest and bravest soldiers in the most dangerous places? A regiment may be a small part of the army engaged, yet the result of the whole battle may turn on the way it acts in a crisis. As Hancock shouted to his men as he rode along the lines at Gettysburg, when Pickett's valorous columns came surging upon them, "Men, stand fast; hold the lines; the safety of the whole army depends upon it. You must hold the lines." So the Divine Commander details us to positions in the line of battle, where the onslaught may be directed. He says, "Take the stand there. Fight there! Bleed there! If necessary, die there! Thou art a Christian soldier, and Christian warfare is a time for unlimited sacrifice." My friend, if you are not to-day in a line of Gospel battle; if you are not to-day suffering for Christ's sake, then one fact is self-evident: you are not doing the work God has given you to do. O Christian warrior, where are your scars? Where are the marks of struggle? Where have you been winning triumphs for your Divine Master and King? Is your name to-day upon the Honor Roll of those Christian soldiers who have come through great tribulation, and have had their robes washed in the blood of the Lamb?

A Legend of a Burden

Dr. N. D. Hillis, in one of his books, tells this beautiful legend: Many years ago, a king and his people heard of a wonderful region in the far East to which they longed to go, and in which they wished to settle. They decided to pull down their tents and gather their flocks and herds together and emigrate. But though many things were willingly left behind, the king was loath to leave a famous tree on the side of which were carved the names of his ancestors and the deeds of his heroic people. But the tree was heavy to carry, and the king was almost persuaded to leave it behind. But there was one youth in his household who loved the king much and begged the honor of transporting the king's treasure. It was a heavy tree to lift, but the young man shouldered it. Day after day the emigrants journeyed on. Because the tree was so heavy, the youth at first had to fall behind, and often it was late at night before he reached the camp. But he learned to love his task. Then it was found that each day by carrying his burden the youth grew stronger. Then it was found that his comrades in the encampment who carried the lightest loads grew weaker. Then it was found that the youth who bore the famous tree was able to carry it easily up steep mountains, for this magic tree put forth clusters of richest fruits to quench his thirst. At last, when the pilgrims reached the far country, in all the tribe there was no one so strong and happy as the youth who had carried the heaviest load. Then said the king and his people, "Blessed is he who hungers for the hardest tasks." So God places all his Christian soldiers in the line of Gospel battle. The men who are willing to make the greatest sacrifices, and do the most valiant deeds for their Divine Commander, are the Christian soldiers who grow the strongest and are the happiest in his dear service. Where are your scars, O Christian soldiers? What burdens have you borne for him?

But though the Divine Commander may detail us to the most dangerous positions in the line of battle, though he may allow the conflict of life to wage fiercely about us, though he may let the blows of the enemy strike heavy and deep, and often fetch the heart's blood, yet he will never allow us to be overwhelmed and defeated if we trust him and do what he wants us to do, and rely on his loving care. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every one whom he receiveth." That is the one rule of service. That is the divine law which affirms that every true Gospel soldier must bear the scars of battle. But the other assurance is just as sure and as far-reaching. "God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it."

Reserve in a Crisis

Here is a picture of the line of battle. Yonder are the two flanks of the army, thoroughly entrenched and protected from the line of fire. Here is the centre of the army made up of men with stern faces fighting for their lives. Again and again the enemy charges. The brigade and the division commanders become frighted. Away their staff-officers gallop to headquarters begging and beseeching for reinforcements. "We must have more troops or we are lost!" is the cry. But the far-seeing eye of the commander-in-chief sweeps the field with his glass and answers, "Not yet. The rear-guard must be held in leash for a while. Not yet! Go back to your generals and tell them to hold their positions a little longer." Still the battle rages. But just as the enemy have concentrated their fire and moved forward on a grand charge, then the commander says, "Order up the rear-guard. This is the psychological moment. Now let the great forward movement be made." Then the reserve force, like a great avalanche, sweeps on and the charging force is halted. Then the enemy is driven back. Then the charge is turned into a rout and a flying mob. So it is with the Divine Commander. He lets us struggle on and on. He lets us struggle until all seems lost. Then with a mighty clarion call he moves up his reserve force and turns our impending defeat into a glorious victory. For "the God of Israel shall be your rereward." O Christian soldier, is not this military figure the picture of your past life?

Reserve Forces

Do you not remember the time years ago when you got entangled in the meshes of that financial difficulty? Like Schuyler Colfax, implicated in the scandal of the Credit Mobilier rascalities, you knew you were honest. You knew that a dishonest dollar had never stuck to the palm of your hand. But somehow you could not make your accounts balance. Disgrace was facing not only you, but your wife and children. You can remember the scene as though it was yesterday. The night before the accounting must be made, you went to your room and locked the door and knelt by your bed and said, "O God, thou knowest I am honest. Thou knowest I have done no wrong. Thou alone can help me. Save my good name. Save me for the honor of my family." Then it was as though by a miraculous power you were saved. You found the slip of paper which held the link to the chain of financial evidence. Or the man who had stolen the money from the trust fund returned it. And when all seemed lost, God saved you by the advancing "rear-guard." For "the God of Israel will be your rereward."

But there is another great fact about this rear-guard. It is always composed of the best soldiers in the army. Its numbers may not be very large. It may be comprised, as an old soldier told me, of only two brigades out of three whole divisions. But it is made up of true and tried veterans. For those who compose the rear-guard must have proved themselves able to stand the test. So I have always felt that God has for us a rear-guard made up of the best Christian forces we have ever known. They are the good men and women who have stood behind us ever since we were born. And during the great moral and spiritual struggles, in God's name as well as in the name of infinite love, they have always come to our rescue.

The Help of the Veterans

And the peculiar fact about this rear-guard is: the older we grow the more their spiritual help seems to be by our side. For instance, take that rear-guard of the old homestead. One would naturally suppose those veterans' usefulness was ended. Why, your father and mother have been dead for at least twenty years. Then the last five years of her life your mother was a helpless, physical invalid. She spent most of her time in bed. She was so weak that she could not even read. You now can hear your sister reading to her hour after hour. Then as for walking, that was out of the question. She had fallen upon the ice and broken her hip, and the bones never knitted again. Oh, what a useless Christian warrior she thought she was! And yet as the years roll on she is drawing nearer and nearer to you. When the temptations of life come you can see her face. You can feel her touch. You can hear the words of advice she used to give. Why, her favorite passages of Scripture are to-day ringing in your memory. God has made her love, her prayers, her words of counsel your rear-guard. Do not tell me she is dead. She is pleading with you now to surrender your heart to the Master's touch.

But there is another impressive fact about God's reserves. As the Divine Commander has detailed certain sainted spirits of the past and present to aid us in the battle of life, so God would detail us to be spiritual rear-guards for some of our dear ones. What ou

MARKET DAY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

COLOMBIA, the most northern of the republics of the southern continent, is the only State in South America which has a frontier on both the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. It extends from the Caribbean to the Pacific, and in area is as large as France and Spain together.

Three chains of the Cordilleras of the Andes occupy the west, forming immense valleys through which flow the Magdalena and the Cauca rivers. Broad plains, sloping towards the Amazonian basin and the Orinoco, are vast undeveloped territories, filling up the eastern section.

After years of civil war and bloodshed, which crippled the national industries and brought the country to the verge of bankruptcy, Colombia is now, under the impulse of General Reyes, slowly emerging from chaos. The chief departments of State administration are being overhauled, and officials, independent of politics, are filling responsible posts. It is generally felt that the revolutionary spirit is waning and the various political parties are strengthening the hands of the government.

A new era of industrial progress appears to have dawned. A great deal of foreign capital is flowing into the country and hundreds of tons of railway material have been imported and despatched far up the River Magdalena for railway construction in the interior. Cartagena, Puerto Colombia and Santa Marta are becoming important places of call for steamers.

At these ports we saw bags of coffee and cocoa, bales of tobacco, bundles of hides, bags of ivory nuts, and even small bars of pure gold being shipped. On the Magdalena River a good service of river steamers is carried on by seven transport companies, three of which are under German control. The voyage up the Magdalena to La Dorada, some 600 miles, can be performed in eight or ten days with comparative safety, provided the traveler escapes yellow fever or malaria.

Hitherto, Colombia has been a decaying survival of a past age. Equality of religious rights, morality, education, sanitation and science are only beginning to agitate public thought. While the law technically recognizes religious liberty, the Roman Church is so deeply rooted as to control the public authorities in the provinces. Primary education is greatly neglected. Probably only one child out of every fifty of school age comes under instruction. The administration of justice is very lax. Towns like Barranquilla, Buena Ventura and Cartagena exist in a chronic condition of filth, abominable to behold and worse to live in. Railways are practically non-existent; travel is now carried on by the tedious and costly method of the pack-mule. The principal cities of the interior are almost entirely isolated from the outside world. Yet this country is naturally very rich; its highland provinces are healthy and its people kindly and hospitable.

Apart from the missionary enterprise of the American Presbyterian Mission and the colporteurs of the British and Foreign Bible Society, no organized evangelical work exists in this vast republic. One year ago the American Presbyterians celebrated their jubilee of missionary work in the State. The first missionary to arrive, we believe, was the Rev. H. B. Pratt, who still uses his pen in the interest of the Spanish evangelical cause. On a recent visit to Barranquilla, we saw one of the first houses to be occupied by the missionaries and used to-day as a schoolhouse. During all these years different missionaries have labored on amid discouragement, priestly opposition and political crises.

At the present time the mission operates three central stations, Barranquilla on the coast, Medellin at an elevation of some 6,000 feet in the department of Antioquia, and Bogota, the capital, at an elevation of 9,000 feet. The work combines schools, the preaching of the Gospel and house-to-house visitation. At Barranquilla, there is much to encourage the workers, Mr. and Mrs. Lee and Mr. and Mrs. Graham, and their devoted helpers, Misses Scott and Hastings, not only in promise of the children in the schools, but in the constancy and fervor of the converts.

Barranquilla, connected with the coast by a short railway twenty miles long, is the starting point for the river traffic up the Magdalena, and the capital of the triangle-shaped Departamento del Atlantico. With its 40,000 inhabitants, it maintains its position as the leading distributing centre and principal port in Colombia.

In the Doorway of a Colombian Home

For the South American Bible colporteur, the market is always an interesting and important centre, and Barranquilla is far from forming an exception to this rule. Fruit and vegetables are brought across the Magdalena during the night in canoes from Santa Marta. Early in the morning, men, women and children come trooping into the market. On the ground, in the open, they spread their Indian corn, yucca, heads of plantains, bananas, chocolate, chancoca, etc., only partly covered from the hot rays of the sun by the awnings of canoes. Then bartering begins. We pass in and out among the crowds with our wallet of Bibles offering them the Bread of Eternal Life. There is little opposition from the people. Some are indifferent, but suspicious glances are cast at a foreigner selling New Testaments at twenty cents each and five cent Gospels. Many are led to make purchases and to carry the book of priceless worth back to their country huts.

How poor many of these peasants are! Visiting from house to house, the poverty witnessed is painful. In some districts people are almost perishing for lack of bread. Here is a sample from one of our men's diaries: "On entering a home in a heap of ruins and noting the physical sufferings, I opened my Testament and began to read comforting passages—living messages from the tree of life, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations—to the poor mother. Probably few such words had ever fallen on her ears, for the Word of God is an unknown book here. 'May God bless you, young man,' she says, 'for those beautiful words which you have brought to this home to-day. They surely will help me bear with patience the hard lot which God has permitted to fall on me, to try me and see if I trust in him! May the Word of God left in this poverty-stricken home bring God's own comfort with it.'"

Here is another incident from Ramon Espinosa, our Bible worker in Bogota: "I called at the house of a señora who had two children, and offering my books, she said: 'Señor, we have no dollars to spare to-day.' I stepped in and began to read the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, and talked to the children, telling them Jesus loved them, sympathized with them and sought their good; and if they loved and obeyed him too, they would grow up to be good and follow in his footsteps. The dear little fellows were so interested in this story of Jesus' interest in children that they begged their mother to buy them a book, even if they had to go without shoes. We wonder how many boys there are in England or America who are prepared to sacrifice a pair of shoes or a meal for a New Testament."

God is clearly prospering his servants in the circulation of his Word in this neglected country, opening homes to the testimony of the Gospel and causing the gracious seed to be sown in many hearts. It is ours to pray that it may take root, spring up and bear fruit unto eternal life.

A Progressive Settlement

THE Jacob A. Rus Neighborhood Settlement, Nos. 48 and 50 Henry Street, New York City, had a total attendance during the past year of over 68,000. The Settlement has two flourishing kindergartens, a sewing school, cooking and other industrial classes, mothers' clubs and clubs for boys, girls, young men and young women. Besides the social work, friendly visits are made in the homes and help or relief given when needed.

This year marks a new policy in the men's work. The superintendent has, so to speak, gone out into the highways and hedges and brought in the element which usually prefers the street corners and saloons. This has required tact and diplomacy, but it is succeeding and is gaining the respect and enthusiasm of the new members.

Last summer 700 people spent from one to two or more weeks at the Settlement Home at Twin Island. Besides this, the boys enjoyed a two weeks' outing at Camp Rus, at Huntington, L. I., while many others were sent away on excursions to different places. Contributions in aid of the Settlement work may be sent to Miss Lillian C. House, treasurer, 48 Henry Street, New York, who will promptly acknowledge them.

"THE LETTERS OF QUEEN VICTORIA"

A Remarkable Compilation Which Throws a New Light on the Domestic, Political and Social Life of Britain's Great Ruler

IN three handsome volumes published by authority of the King of England, copyrighted by that monarch in Great Britain and her dependencies; edited by Professor Arthur Christopher Benson and Viscount Esher, and printed on the presses of Longmans, Green & Co., the famous publishers, The Letters of Queen Victoria, being a selection from her correspondence between the years 1837 and 1861, are given to the reading world. This latest contribution to the "literature of royalty" is the most notable of its kind, as far as the present generation is concerned, and has attracted much attention from the critics and reviewers.

Queen Victoria (1840)

Her Majesty Queen Victoria (says the preface) dealt with her papers, from the first, in a most methodical manner: "She formed the habit in early days of preserving all her private letters, and after her accession to the throne, all her official papers were similarly treated and bound in volumes. The Prince Consort, her husband, instituted an elaborate system of classification, annotating and even indexing many of the documents with his own hand. The result is that the collected papers form what is probably the most extraordinary series of State documents in the world. These volumes by no means comprise all the Queen's correspondence in the period indicated."

Queen Adelaide (1832)

The papers which deal with her life up to 1861 would comprise between five and six hundred volumes. King Edward decided that it was necessary to select for publication only those that would "serve to bring out the development of the Queen's character and disposition, and to give typical instances of her methods in dealing with political and social matters."

Victoria's reminiscences of her early childhood, written in 1872, and preserved in manuscript at Windsor — and only now printed — are delightfully entertaining. She tells how she had a "great horror of Bishops on account of their wigs and aprons," but she was pleased and conciliated when the Bishop of Salisbury let her play with his badge as Chancellor of the Order of the Garter. Her childhood was passed amid unostentatious surroundings. "I was brought up very simply," she wrote, "never had a room to myself till I was nearly grown up—always slept in my mother's room till I came to the throne. At Claremont, and in the small houses at the bathing-places, I sat and took my lessons in my governess's bed-room. I was not fond of learning as a little child, and baffled every attempt to teach me my letters up to five years old, when I consented to learn them by their being written down before me."

Victoria Receiving the News of Her Accession (1837)

Her first note — an event in the life of a simple girl—was from the Duchess of Clarence, who afterward became Queen Adelaide, and she quotes from it: "I hope you are well and don't forget Aunt Adelaide." Later, she had a decidedly extensive correspondence with her uncle, Prince Leopold of Belgium, who, being her elder by many years, thought it fit and proper to send his young friend amiable little lessons on character and behavior. "Nothing," writes this royal moralist, "is so great and clear a proof of unfitness for greater and nobler actions than a mind that is seriously occupied by trifles." However, he won the respect and affection of the little princess, whom he addressed as "my dearest and most beloved child," and whom he advised never to permit herself to be induced to express to people around her "any opinion or sentiment of your own, which is beyond the sphere of common conversation and its ordinary topics." Years afterward, when he had become King of the Belgians and she was seated on the throne of England, he continued his advisory letters and they seem to have been well received. "Do not permit anybody," he wrote, "even your Prime Minister, to speak to you on matters that concern you personally, without your having expressed the wish of its being done." He impresses her at every opportunity with the sacredness and inviolability of royalty, and urges her to enforce all its prerogatives. In one letter there is a possible suggestion of ultimate personal advantage to accrue from this friendly correspondence. "Before you decide on anything important," he wrote, "I should be glad if you would consult me." Leopold's counsel evidently impressed the young ruler, and his influence is visible in many of her letters, which show that she applied his teachings in a practical way, although evidence is not wanting to prove that she was occasionally restive under his assumed dictation and broke away from it.

Noteworthy as a historical contribution is the story from Victoria personally of her formal notification of her accession to the throne, which reads as follows:

I was awoke at six o'clock by Mamma, who told me that the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Conyngham were here, and wished to see me. I got out of bed and went into my sitting-room (only in my dressing gown) and alone, and saw them. Lord Conyngham (the Lord Chamberlain) then acquainted me, that my poor uncle, the King, was no more, and had expired at twelve minutes past two this morning, and consequently that I am Queen. Lord Conyngham knelt down and kissed my hand, at the same time delivering to me the official announcement of the poor King's demise. The Archbishop then told me that the Queen was desirous that he should come and tell me the details of the last moments of my poor, good uncle; he said that he had directed his mind to religion, and had died in a perfectly happy, quiet state of mind and was quite prepared for his death. . . . I then went to my room and dressed.

Since it has pleased Providence to place me in this station, I shall do my utmost to fulfil my duty towards my country. I am very young, and perhaps in many, though not in all things, inexperienced; but I am sure that very few have more real good will and more real desire to do what is fit and right than I have.

Breakfasted, during which time good, faithful Stockmar came and talked to me. Wrote a letter to dear Uncle Leopold and a few words to dear good Feodore. Received a letter from Lord Melbourne, in which he said he would wait upon me at a little before nine. At nine came Lord Melbourne, whom I saw in my room, and of course quite alone, as I shall always do all my Ministers. He kissed my hand, and I then acquainted him that it had long been my intention to retain him and the rest of the present Ministry at the head of affairs, and that it could not be in better hands than his. He again kissed my hand.

Elsewhere she naively relates how the Archbishop, on the occasion of her coronation, awkwardly put the ring on her wrong finger and jammed it so tightly that it hurt her a great deal when she took it off again after the ceremony.

The story of Victoria's first acquaintance with Prince Albert, who afterward became Prince Consort, is very simply told in these letters. It was to the King of the Belgians, as she told Leopold in letter on June 7, 1836, that she owed thanks for "the prospect of great happiness you have contributed to give me in the person of dear Albert." In a previous letter she had written of him, "Albert is extremely handsome." But while her admiration was awakened, the young Queen resolved to be circumspect in her love affairs. On July 15 she wrote to Leopold that even though she might like Albert she could "make no final promise this year; . . . for, independent of my youth and my great repugnance to change my present position, there is no anxiety evinced in this country for such an event." Then in the next sentence, womanlike, she expressed her misgivings as to herself. "Though I have little doubt I shall like him, still one can never answer beforehand for feelings, and I may not have the feeling for him that is requisite to insure happiness. I may like him as a friend, as a cousin, as a brother, but no more: should this be the case (which is not likely), I am very anxious that it should be understood that I am not guilty of any breach of promise, for I never gave any." However, the match moved auspiciously and the engagement was announced in due time. On October 15, 1839, she wrote from Windsor: "My mind is quite made up, and I told Albert this morning of it; the warm affection he showed me on learning this, gave me great pleasure. He seems perfection, and I think that I have the prospect of very

AMONG THE HEAD-HUNTING DYAKS

STILL in the prime of life and hopeful of many more years of earnest labor, the Venerable Archdeacon Sharp, now revisiting England, has a wonderful story to tell of missionary enterprise hich is regenerating the savage tribes of Borneo. The land is 900 miles in length and 700 in its widest extent. s rich mineral resources, its osition in the highway of comerce, and its tropical but ealthy climate, render it atractive alike to the merchant nd the traveler. In one great istrict of this magnificent island, e coast strip called Sarawak, ritain has a paramount interest, rough the romantic history of ajah James Brooke, the famus Englishman who became its ler and commenced the regenration of the island.

"I left England years ago to to Singapore with the offer f a government chaplaincy," id Archdeacon Sharp, "but was sked to undertake missionary ork at Sarawak. I have had y headquarters for nine years Kuching, the capital. There no other place in the world ke Sarawak. The natives of e Dyak race are unique. They e wonderfully moral for hean. They very strictly observe eir set customs, but it is difcult to convince them that the ws of God may not be evaded. hieving is unknown among em, and when they lie it is a childish way. We can trust them with anything.

"A Dyak house is really a village in itself. It is a ry long veranda building, extending for 200 yards. alf the structure consists of the veranda, the other alf of rooms. The residents climb up by poles, with tches cut in them, and do all their work in the verda. Perhaps a dozen families live in one use. The Dyaks are a fine, manly people. has been very unjustly said that Chrisanity robs the Dyak of his manliness. may indeed make him less warlike, but robs him of his passion for human heads.

"Sir James Brooke and his nephew Sir harles Brooke, the present rajah, have eadily repressed head-hunting; but poical repression will never suffice for its termination, for it breaks out again henever there is war between any of the ibes. Yet it is marvelous that a handl of Europeans should keep all these pulations in order. The Sea Dyaks e the most numerous and the most stalart and have chased the Land Dyaks to the hills. When Sir James Brooke me on the scene, however, in 1838, the alays were the dominant race. There e some very wild, shy tribes in the inrior, such as the Kyans, the Kanyahs d the Poonans, the last named living in e shade of the great jungles. Chinese ttlers are steadily increasing in Borneo, d they are now planting themselves in tle colonies dotted about the great island, chiefly for growing pepper. These Chinese colonists in Borneo are the backbone of the population for agriculture. They also work Rajah Brooke's coal mines and likewise the gold mines in Upper Sarawak."

I asked the Archdeacon to give me some details as to the peculiar aboriginal customs of these people.

Workers on a Pepper Plantation in Borneo

"You mean, of course, the head-hunting especially?" he said. "In the old days, a man was not reckoned a warrior till he had brought home a human head. Till then he was not permitted to tattoo himself and had no portion at all in the tribe. They had a superstition that they could propitiate the spirit of a dead man by feasting with his head on the table, and they danced with heads on their laps. Even young girls danced with skulls there. Heads were kept in sacks on a part of the veranda, and near this they placed their guests. Head-hunting is still a ghastly reality in Borneo. Only Christianity can eradicate it. The religion of the pagan Dyaks is a sort of animism, with innumerable gods of the sea, land, woods and rivers; but all the spirits are evil and the Dyaks fear them absolutely. They have a vague notion of one Supreme God, but do not believe that he cares for them. The population of Sarawak is nearly 500,000. The Dyaks number about 150,000. The Malays are all Mohammedans, and we are not allowed to work among them, because when Sir James Brooke took over the country, he agreed that their religion should not be interfered with.

"The Dyaks are steadily becoming Christianized. At Kuching we have a great boarding and day school for boys with 200 pupils, and a smaller establishment for girls, with thirty pupils for a beginning. We want to build a large school for Dyak and Chinese girls. Miss Caroline Sharp, my sister, is superintendent of the girls' school, and a younger sister is acting as trained nurse. At Merdang, an inland village, a church of ironwood has been built by the converted Dyaks themselves. Of our industrial school we have great hopes. This is the right thing for the improvement of the Dyaks, for by nature and habit they do not believe in systematic work. We try to make them learn to grow pepper, coffee, cocoa, sago and rubber in our plantations. Our first plantation of 200 rubber trees was destroyed by stray pigs and goats.

"The people are eager to be taught, and we receive applications from many inland villages for teachers. We are now at work in ten villages round Merdang and we have chapels in each of these. There was only one when I went out. We do not pauperize our converts. They have to build the chapels for themselves, without outside aid.

"The Dyak independence of character is splendid. They were once pirates. They sometimes send complaints to the government that in this or that village they have no teacher. We have more of these demands than we can meet. All the Christian work in these villages is being done by native teachers whom we missionaries have trained.

"The Gospel work round Merdang was begun by a good Dyak convert, who gave half his time as a labor of love. One of his converts became a catechist in another village and brought the whole of it to Christ."

There are spiritual lives depending upon us, our spiritual welfare has depended upon the faithlness of others in the past. And oh, my friends, what awful eternal calamity is going to befall some of ose who are near and dear to us, if we do not do ur duty to them as their spiritual rear-guard!

You must bear well in mind that those souls will and before the judgment seat of Christ, and will ink of us, and what we have done or should have me for them. The most overwhelming moment of y ministerial career was when this fact was driven me to me in a way I shall never forget. It was bbath evening, July 20, 1907. We were tossing out upon the Pacific Ocean. We had just saved me one hundred and fifteen lives from a watery ave. At the request of the passengers I was holdg a service in the cabin. Just as I arose to speak, lady came and took my hand. She looked earnestly into my face as she said, "Dr. Talmage, I was on board the steamer Columbia when she sank this morning. I thought you were a thousand miles away. Last Sunday morning, I was in your church and heard you preach. And I want to tell you that when the ship gave a lurch and went down to her watery grave, and I was pitched into the sea, the last thought that I had when I expected to meet my God, was of you and your sermon." I never asked her what that thought was. I was afraid to know. I said: "Can it be that the words which I speak, perhaps at random, may so influence some man, some woman, for or against God, that with them they shall march up to meet their Divine King at the judgment seat of Christ?" Thus God has sent you, O man and woman, to be spiritual rear-guard for your fellowmen.

Are you doing for others as your Christian parents and friends in the past have done for you? Thus Isaiah, seven hundred years before Christ was born in the Bethlehem stable, is enunciating in the words of my text the same Gospel truth as Paul, the greatest of the apostles, taught in the sixth chapter of Galatians, after Christ ascended from Mount Olivet. The scenes are almost identical. They both represent a struggle. God, the great Commander-in-Chief, is detailing us to certain duties. Thus Paul, as he sees a great load upon our backs, says, "Every man shall bear his own burden." That means, God expects us to stand in the difficult places on the line of battle. Then Paul goes in the same chapter, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." That means, every Christian soldier shall be a rear guard to every other Christian soldier. Then, over these two contemplations, the Psalmist writes these words: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee." So God will help us bear the burdens of life, while we try to bear our own burdens and the burdens of our dear ones. "For ye shall not go out with haste, nor go by flight; for the Lord will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rereward."

The Queen's Letters

MORE than mere literary interest attaches to the volumes of Queen Victoria's letters, noticed on another page of this issue. The good Queen had warm friends and admirers in this country, as she had in most lands besides her own. Few who have occupied so high a position for so long a time as she, have secured and retained in so eminent a degree the affectionate regard of the whole world. Her good sense, her tact and kindness, her sympathy with suffering, her blameless life and her heavy sorrow, won for her the good will of the foreigner and the hearty loyalty and love of her own people. Her ministers might be criticized and censured and their conduct and policy condemned; but no one thought of including the Queen in the blame, for it was everywhere recognized that the revered lady had the most gracious and kindly feelings toward all, and, in all she said and did, had a conscientious desire to do her full duty. We in this country especially remembered with gratitude how her interference at a critical moment saved our self-respect from being wantonly wounded, and toned down utterances which it would have been hard for us to bear.

The little that we knew of Queen Victoria inspired us with respect for her as a monarch, and that respect is increased by the revelation now made in these volumes of her letters, of her character as a woman. She was one of the persons who are more liked the better they are known. In raising the curtain that hid her personal and domestic life, her son and those who were most intimate with her appear to have had perfect confidence that the revelation would tend to the enhancement of the world's esteem. The naive remarks she makes in the letters to her uncle and to her ministers, now known to the outside public for the first time, show her native shrewdness, but, more than all, her innate goodness. She was so good that the worldly Leopold could not spoil her; nor could her beloved husband, with all his influence, induce her to overstep her conception of her prerogative. She would not try to be the autocrat that his ideas of the monarch's rights would have made her. Gentle, kind, tactful, she ruled according to her conscience, and she ruled wisely and well. Coming to the throne at a critical period, when the stupidities and the vices of her predecessors had shaken the loyalty of her people to her house, she reformed the court and set an example of domestic purity to the nation, of which it was in sore need. How a girl of eighteen could have done this, with so much delicacy, was a mystery; but we know that it was done, and these letters show that the change was due more to her own purity and piety, and less to her counselors, than had been generally supposed.

The Coming Holiday Season

THE first of the cold-weather holidays, Thanksgiving, is nearly here. The results of the recent financial panic are passing away like the ripples after a big wave. The excitement of election is also gone, and people standing on the threshold of winter are taking a mental account of stock, of deeds done or left undone, as they always do before some day from which they measure their lives forward or backward.

For the greater part of the American people it has not been an unprosperous year, and they are making preparations to have a festal day at home. Those who are fortunate enough to have relatives in the country are preparing to return to the old homestead, with all its happy and sad memories, though the latter are always dimmed by the former, let us hope, on Thanksgiving.

One of the saddest thoughts that will come involuntarily to thinking people as they come to the heavily laden table, or gather later in the twilight before the fire, is that somewhere, and probably not far distant, there are others whose dinner may have been so small that it hardly sufficed to keep body and soul together. If people really want to enjoy Thanksgiving, they should see that at least one person less fortunate than themselves has the opportunity given him to enjoy the day also. There is no place so prosperous, no town so small, that it does not have several families who are worthy and poor. A little unostentatious giving, not as from one above them, but in a friendly and Christian way, will bring them gladness not only on Thanksgiving, but cheer them for weeks afterwards.

As usual, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will provide dinners for several hundred poor families on the Lower East Side of New York City. A dinner will also be given to as many as possible of the unemployed. The readers and friends of the paper in the past have helped THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to reach as many as possible in this way. If this year you have no one person or family in mind that needs help, you might join with others of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family in providing for some of the destitute of New York. Even a little goes a long way with these people who have nothing. Try somewhere to help others to be thankful. Your own dinner will taste better and your own heart will be lighter.

After the Storm

AFTER storm comes the sunshine. Although the mutterings of the recent panic can still be heard, they are becoming less and less distinct. The confidence of conservative business men in the outlook finds abundant justification, for there are cheering signs on every hand. Banks are resuming regular business, depositors are fairly over their scare and, notwithstanding a few isolated indications of weakness, the general situation is rapidly becoming normal.

In a certain sense, the late experience has not been without its compensations. It has directed attention to the need of additional safeguards in our banking methods which, when introduced, will result in substantial benefit to the whole country. None are so keenly appreciative of this fact as the bankers themselves. On the other hand, it has demonstrated the unspeakable folly and injustice of indiscriminate attacks on capitalists and corporations, and the positive unrighteousness of a policy that would inflict loss and suffering on multitudes of innocent investors, who could by no rule of law or logic be held responsible for the real or supposed faults of individuals at the head of such corporations. There is little likelihood that anything in the nature of a general reckless assault on business will again be attempted. Recent experience has been a severe lesson, and, let us hope, an effectual one.

A Growing Social Peril

NO apology is needed for a protest against the foolish talk that may be heard in some quarters about a new relation in the domestic circle, who is commonly referred to as the "affinity." She is not mother, sister or wife, but occupies a vague position as an interloper in the social order, whose claims are coming to be recognized as paramount. Some of the talk is inadequately characterized as foolish, for it is wicked; but for the greater part it does not proceed to action and is mere idle silliness and gush. In one conspicuous instance, however, it has developed into a dissolution of the family and a scandal, consequent on the complacence of the parties concerned. There is always a possibility of an example of that kind commending itself to men of erratic character, who hope that an indulgence of their vagrant fancy may be regarded by the public as excusable.

It cannot be too soon or too clearly shown that the American people, especially the Christian public, will not condone any nonsense of that kind. It has too high a regard for purity in domestic life, and will not tolerate offenses that impair it. The war that has been waged against the Mormons, who boldly added the affinity to the household, proved that polygamy was regarded as an offense against public decency and against the national conscience. This attempt to introduce successive polygamy is still more odious, because it involves greater suffering and open shame. That there are cases in which divorce is justifiable cannot be denied, but only extreme wrongdoing or intolerable misery can be accepted as valid ground for recourse to the remedy. The mere desire to get rid of a partner who has lost her youth and charms, and to replace her with one who has both, is no such ground.

The evil, however, does not in many instances proceed so far. It may consist in nothing more than the preference for the society of a person other than the legitimate partner. It is in such preference, and the indulgence of it, that the danger lies. No one realizes at the beginning of such an association how rapidly the passions may develop. The noxious weed grows with amazing speed, and it has the tendency to intoxicate the mind and becloud the reason. The warning of approaching disaster causes the victim to exclaim: "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" Yet he may drift on the seductive stream until he is unable to avoid doing it. The time comes when to do right involves such a struggle as Christ described as cutting off the right hand, or sacrificing the right eye; when to give up is like rending the very heart. Many have lost life and the soul itself in ignobly yielding rather than taking the firm but painful course. The crisis becomes worse than one of life and death, and it is of such a crisis, in its incipient stage, that people in society talk so lightly and frivolously, when they discuss the subject of the "affinity."

A Request from Dr. Klopsch

I APPEAL to all of our subscribers who would like to be of real assistance to an exceptionally busy man, to help me at this time.

This they can do by renewing their subscriptions as early as convenient, thus enabling me to distribute over a more protracted term the pressure usually incident to the holiday season. Such a course prevents congestion in our Subscription and Premium Departments. In co-operating with me to this extent, the advantage resulting is altogether mutual. It affords me opportunity to personally direct prompt shipment of premiums, and it insures the delivery of these premiums, changes of date, etc., before the great holiday rush interferes with the express, mail and subscription service.

It goes without saying that an early renewal does not entail any loss on the subscriber, since the new subscription date is advanced one year from the present date of expiry.

The first editions of our premiums and calendars, always the best, are now ready. Shipment can be made at once, and prompt delivery is at this time practically assured. Later on, the congestion of facilities is very likely to cause irritating delays.

Heretofore I have always been favored with the heartiest co-operation of our subscribers, who thus greatly facilitated the prompt handling of our holiday trade, and I feel confident that the present year will prove no exception to the rule.

Thanking you in advance for any help you may afford me in this matter, and grateful for past favors, I am,

Very cordially yours,

Louis Klopsch

Among the Workers

—REV. S. T. SHERWOOD presided at the Semi-Centennial Anniversary of the National Association of Local Preachers which was held in Washington October 11 to 15 inclusive.

—JOHN G. WOOLLEY, the famous temperance advocate, has been called to the presidency of the National Federation of Gospel Missions, vice Charles H. Madison, resigned on account of illness. The headquarters of the Federation will be in New York hereafter. There are now some forty missions represented in the membership list, and it is believed that this number will be more than doubled within a year.

Earthquake Disasters

An appalling earthquake occurred in southern Italy on October 23, which caused widespread destruction. Its centre appears to have been in Calabria, where thirty villages suffered. At Reggio and Messina also buildings were thrown down, and at Gerace the walls of the cathedral collapsed. It was, however, at Ferrozzani that the greatest damage was done. The people were asleep in their beds when the shocks commenced and at least five hundred were buried in the ruins of the houses. A still larger number were severely injured, many of whom must die. Members of the Red Cross Society and soldiers came in the early morning and extricated many of the still living sufferers from the fallen walls, and worked all day digging in places where cries indicated that living persons were held by timbers or debris of the houses. The King of Italy promptly sent funds for the relief of the sufferers, many of whom had lost even their clothing. Army tents were also sent to shelter the homeless. The town is difficult of access and has no telegraph, but has been reached by the sea. It will be a long time before the full extent of the calamity is revealed.

A still greater disaster is reported from Russian Turkestan, on the north of Afghanistan. There was a severe earthquake on October 21, which caused great damage throughout the whole of Turkestan. The extent of the catastrophe was not fully ascertained, when a still greater calamity occurred. The town of Karatagh, noted for its manufacture of fine cutlery, was situated at the base of the high mountain of the same name in the Hissar range of Bokhara. An enormous section of the mountain was shaken loose by the earthquake, and hung suspended for three days. The people were too busy with their fallen houses to notice it, but suddenly it fell with intense velocity on the town, crushing it completely. It is believed that nearly all the 2,500 inhabitants must have perished. The town is remote from the usual line of travel and it took a full week for the news of the calamity to reach Tashkend. It was stated that the governor and his mother, who occupied a house at a little distance from the town, are supposed to be almost the sole survivors. Later news may perhaps show that there were others, but the absence of appeals for help seems to imply that the disaster destroyed the whole people. Unhappily, there were more people than usual in the town at the time of the catastrophe. In the fall of the year the people from surrounding districts go to Karatagh to enjoy the renovating breezes from the mountain. It is feared that many visitors are therefore among the victims. It is stated that no help will be sent by the Russian government to the stricken town, as it regards the town of Karatagh as outside its jurisdiction. Such calamities coming without warning and proving to man how utterly helpless he is in the grasp of nature's forces, should lead us to place our trust in Him who is greater than nature, and who is our refuge and strength, an unfailing resource in all calamities. Then we may say with the Psalmist:

> Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea. (Ps. 46 : 2.)

Americans Arrested in Russia

News was received last week that Mr. William E. Walling, with his wife and sister-in-law, had been arrested in St. Petersburg. Mr. Walling is a citizen of Indianapolis, Ind., and a grandson of the late Mr. William H. English, once a candidate for Vice-President of the United States. The three Americans had made the acquaintance of certain prominent Finns in the Russian capital and had dined with them at their hotel. The whole party were suddenly seized by the police and carried off to prison, Mr. Walling being sent to a different prison from that in which the two ladies were confined. He succeeded in getting a letter out to the American embassy and our ambassador took immediate steps to obtain the release of the party. They were charged with having given funds and important information to the Russian revolutionists. A minute examination of their baggage by the police failed, however, to give evidence to support the charge. Such arrests are usually not settled for two weeks, even if the prisoners are proved innocent, but by the efforts of the American embassy the prisoners in this case were released after one night's detention and immediately quitted Russia. The Russian government in apologizing for the outrage admitted that they had no evidence against the Americans, but seeing them so friendly with the Finns, became suspicious of them. They evidently believed in the proverb that "a man is known by the company he keeps." The patriotism of the Finns stamps them as criminals in the eyes of the Russian police and Mr. Walling's association with them affected his reputation. We can sympathize with him, knowing how just the Finnish cause is, but we sometimes forget in our religious life that the world is apt to draw the same inference with regard to the Christian as the Russian police did in the case of Mr. Walling, if it sees him habitually associating with wicked men.

> Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them who cause divisions and offenses contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned ; and avoid them. (Rom. 16 : 17.)

A Girl Rescued from Gypsies

An application was made to a court in Albany, N. Y., recently for a search warrant, by a citizen of New York. He said that he had lost his daughter a long time ago and had reason to believe she had been stolen by gypsies. He said he had gone from place to place for more than a year trying to find her in various camps. He had heard that there was a camp near Ravenna and he desired to search it. The warrant was granted and a policeman went with the father to make the search. The leader of the gypsies refused to allow a search to be made and that fact increased the father's suspicion that at last he was on the right track. He refused to leave camp, and sent to the nearest village for assistance. Farmers, railroad men and laborers seized such arms as they had and, with a local justice at their head, went to the camp to help in enforcing the warrant. The girl was found in one of the tents, but she refused to speak and would not indicate whether she wished to remain or to go with her father. She was taken to court and was there made to understand that she would be safe in telling the facts. She then told how she had been kept a prisoner and brutally beaten and starved. She was given into her father's care and the chiefs of the gypsy tribe were held for examination. The poor girl had been so thoroughly intimidated that she would never have been delivered if her father had not interfered. It is often so with the captives of the enemy of souls. They fear that by their own power they cannot escape. To such the testimony of others should give courage.

> Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son. (Col. 1 : 13.)

A Moving Residence

The Board of Special Inquiry at Ellis Island, New York, was astonished at a reply made by a passenger who arrived from Europe last week. He was taken ill during the voyage and when the steamer on which he came landed her passengers he was taken to the hospital. As soon as he was well enough to answer questions he was examined as to his right to be admitted. He said he was English by birth, but had already passed sixteen years in this country and had been on a visit to his native land. He was asked in what American city he had lived during his sixteen years' residence here. He answered that he had lived in no particular city, but had spent twelve years in a box car. The examiners concluded that he was a tramp and were about to pass a sentence of deportation, when he explained that he had been in the employ of the Union Pacific Railroad, and that his duties involved continual travel. The company had facilitated him by fitting up a freight car for his permanent use as a residence and he had had no other home. He had thus been a citizen of the country and as such entitled to admission, though no State or city could claim him. It was a curious life to lead in its complete detachment from local associations. In this it was like the people referred to in Scripture, and we may hope that he had the aspiration that characterized them

> For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. (Heb. 13 : 14.)

A Suit for Spurious Relics

A remarkable suit has just been decided in a Brussels court. A Greek civil engineer while in Constantinople became acquainted with a Turk who had in his possession a silver casket, which, according to his story, contained a piece of the cross on which Christ was crucified, and one of the nails that had been used in the crucifixion. Being a Mohammedan, he had no reverence for the precious relics, and wanted to dispose of them to a Christian purchaser. He had some idea of the value that they should have in Christian eyes, and wanted a high price. An English collector of curiosities visited Constantinople while a purchaser was being sought, and the Greek introduced the Turk to him. The collector was doubtful about the relics, for he knew that many spurious articles of the kind were in existence. But if they were genuine, it would be easy to sell them at a profit. Finally, after some negotiations, he offered to take them to submit to experts, and undertook, if they proved genuine, to pay $3,875 for them. The antiquarians at the British Museum declared them to be spurious, and the collector therefore refused to purchase them. Thereupon he was sued for the money. Being spurious, they were worthless, but if they had proved genuine, their value would have consisted in their association with an event so sacred, that to make [illegible] a matter of bargain and sale would have been shocking to the Christian mind. That there are men capable of engaging in such traffic need not, however, occasion surprise. There are some men so set upon the making of money that nothing is too sacred for them to use in the pursuit. Most of the defendants that are brought to justice were the cloak of piety to [illegible] It has always been so. Even in apostolic times men had the audacity to propose a bargain [illegible] Holy Spirit

> But Peter said, Thy money perish with thee, because thou thought that the gift of God [illegible] with money. (Acts 8 : 20.)

OUR DEPENDENT RACES DISCUSSED

LAKE MOHONK, N. Y., was lately the scene of the Twenty-fifth Annual Conference of Friends of the Indian and Other Dependent Peoples. Over 400 persons were in attendance. Invitations had been sent to those who had been giving special attention to the betterment of conditions among Indians, Filipinos, Porto Ricans, Hawaiians and other so-called child races. The guests included the United States Indian Commissioner and members of the Board of Indian Commissioners, bishops identified for long years with this sort of work, judges of insular courts, army and navy officers, college presidents, philanthropists and members of Congress. There were also present several "natives" to speak in their own behalf. Andrew S. Draper, LL.B., LL.D., Commissioner of Education of the State of New York, presided.

United States Commissioner Leupp spoke of Indians now getting out of reservations to live and work like white people, by which means they were developed in self-help and home building. On the other hand, certain tribes had been so pauperized by having food and blankets given to them, that they have declared themselves to be "government people," and utterly refuse to do any work. These, the commissioner declared, should have their rations withdrawn and be forced to go to work. Dr. E. E. Chivers told of an Indian woman who came to him asking the question: "Can Jesus give rest?" "Can he give an Indian woman rest?" "Can he give me rest?" she asked, holding up before Dr. Chivers her outspread hands upon which were several fingers whose joints had been mutilated as an expression of sorrow for the dead. She did find comfort in Jesus, and so did her husband, who became a Christian and subsequently a deacon in the church; from him Dr. Chivers afterward received the elements of the communion. The fact was stated by the Rev. Charles H. Thompson that the first Bible translation on this continent was made for the Indians by John Eliot. One session of the Conference was devoted to the Philippines. It was stated that a yet barely fifty per cent. of the Filipino children are provided with schools, because of lack of funds. Congress should make provision for them. The tariff should be removed, so that industries on the islands may flourish. Opium, which is considered by the secretary of the Insular Government to be "the Filipinos' greatest peril," should rapidly be reduced to the point of prohibition. There are now 12,150 licensed opium smokers in the Philippines, thirty-five licensed wholesale dealers in opium and 170 retail dealers!

Meeting Place of the Mohonk Conference

The case of the Porto Ricans was well put before the Conference by Hon. Julio Larrinaga, Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico to the United States, and by Mr. George Arias, a well-informed business man of Porto Rico. They made a plea for the granting of United States citizenship, and for greater educational privileges. Mr. Arias said the only discontent felt by Porto Ricans with the United States is that the Constitution stayed at home!

All of these things and many more did the Mohonk Conference consider. In a parting word, when about to to adjourn, the members of the Conference were urged to "serve as distributing centres to make conscience, and give more light."

great happiness before me. I love him more than I can say." They were married on February 10, 1840.

If there is one quality more than any other which these letters show Victoria to have possessed, it is the quality of independence. Her training had well equipped her for sovereignty. She brought to the task a sane and wholesome womanhood, and a clear and well-poised mind. Intensely proud of her nation and its "wooden walls" (its navy), she was a peacemaker by nature, but a stout foe once a war was begun. She would be no one's puppet; she would be ruler in fact as well as in name. Thus, there came a time when she no longer invited Leopold's advice, for (as she wrote to Albert) "Dear uncle is given to believe he must rule the roost everywhere." Neither would she allow herself to be swayed too much by Albert; for while she wrote of him as "an angel," and was charmed with his kindness and affection, there were occasions when this wise young Queen very clearly let him understand that the two were not on the same footing before the English people; that he could not be a peer; that only an Englishman could be at the head of affairs; that the nation was very jealous of any foreigner interfering in state administration. At other times she rebuked his impatience of the demands of business, by writing him: "You forget, my dearest love, that I am the sovereign and that business can stop and wait for nothing."

Among the distinguished men of the early Victorian period, many familiar names are encountered in these volumes, among them being Lord John Russell, Viscount Melbourne, Baron Stockmar, Viscount Palmerston, the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and others. Among her correspondents also were Queen Adelaide, Queen Maria II. of Portugal, and other royal and noble ladies. There are in a large part of the correspondence so many references to high state functions, court ceremonials and exalted politics, that the reader is constantly reminded of the fact that royalty and nobility move in a world peculiarly their own, and have really little in common with the masses of their subjects. Their whole manner of life, their surroundings, duties, thoughts, conversation, and even their recreations and correspondence seem different from those of ordinary mortals. But there are brilliant exceptions, where we find a pleasing flow of spirits and a natural and sometimes quite unrestrained expression of sentiments. Leopold's letters are all clever and readable; although he does occasionally pose as a sober moralist, he can be humorous and epigrammatic. Melbourne, too, has some remarkably frank passages in his letters. Victoria's letters, however, have a charm of candor and stateliness, and a freedom from affectation, which will make them widely read. They must stand as a new and pleasing revelation of the writer's womanly nature—as queen, wife, mother, and the ruler of an empire—which will surprise and please even the English themselves.

In another view, these letters present an instructive panorama of the rise and fall of successive political favorites: Melbourne, Peel, Palmerston, Lord John Russell, Lord Brougham, Earl Derby, Walpole, Lord Dalhousie and the empire-builder Disraeli, all pass and repass, filling the stage a brief space, and then—exit. In the same way we may note the running thread of comment in the letters regarding such far-reaching events as the coup d'etat of Louis Napoleon, wars and other foreign complications, and the horrors of the Indian mutiny. Mingled with these graver topics, we find disclosed the inner workings of cabinets and parliaments and the doings of kings, queens, princes and premiers, almost side by side with the chatter of betrothals, weddings, excursions, and many incidents that lend a piquant interest to the reading.

The Letters of Queen Victoria are finely illustrated. The three volumes, comprising over 1,800 pages, are published at $15.

A CENTRE OF CHURCH LIFE

"UNIQUE" is a word in the English language that has been greatly overworked in recent years, but it may be correctly applied to the new "church clearing-house" that has just been opened by the Episcopal churches in the Borough of the Bronx, in the upper part of Greater New York.

The Borough of the Bronx has been built up within a very few years. Its greatest development came within a short time after the Subway line was opened which connected the large territory lying north and east of the Harlem River with the main part of the city. Streets and houses were constructed as if by magic and the people from Manhattan moved up to the Bronx by the tens of thousands.

The number of Episcopal churches grew until there were over twenty. The Bronx churches were not wealthy enough to build guild houses for their various societies and Bishop Coadjutor Greer conceived the idea of having one large church house for the entire Bronx, where the clubs and societies of all the parishes could meet. It would not only give each parish accommodations they could never afford if working separately, but would also bring together in a social way the officers and members of the various churches.

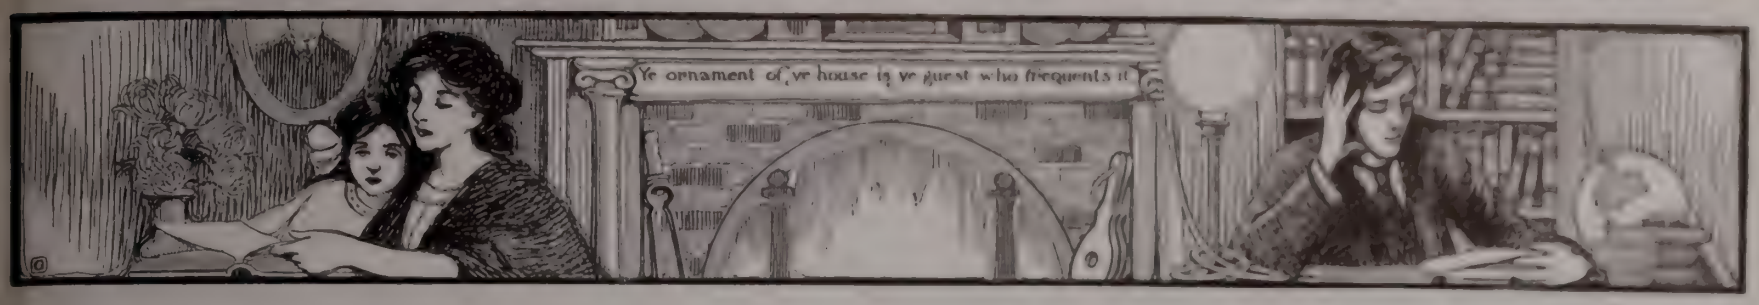
Rev. Dr. F. S. Cookman is in charge and bears the title of vicar. Under him are several assistant clergymen, besides numerous lay workers, both paid and volunteer.

The New Church House in the Bronx

One of the most important things undertaken by the management of the church house has been the quest of former church members, who had moved from other parts of the city. For a while after they came, those who were church members and regular church attendants would take the long ride back to their church. It was a tiresome journey on crowded cars, and in wet and stormy weather it was often abandoned. Some of them would seek new church connections, but a large number became a part of the large body known as "the great unchurched." Canvassers were sent from house to house, and whenever a former church member was found he was given a cordial invitation to come to the headquarters and there, after his dormant interest had been reawakened, he was assigned to the nearest church of his communion. The canvassers also gave invitations to people who had had no religious connections whatever.

The two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the building was raised by Bishop Greer, and an additional sum has been set aside for a permanent endowment fund. The building is an imposing structure of six stories. The auditorium, on the main floor will seat 1,500 people. It will be used for entertainments.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



Sweetness of Temper

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

FEW of us have ever had an enemy. Most of us have many friends. More hands are held out to help than to harm us. We never go anywhere and feel that we are in an enemy's country.

Yet among friends there arise occasions of difference. There are misunderstandings. Our home people, maybe, are irritating. We are annoyed, provoked, exasperated. Somebody says a disagreeable thing, and we hastily retort. Our intimate companions know the weak spots in our character, and if vexed they may take advantage of them and use expressions that hurt like the thrust of a sword. Words can leave wounds, and even when wounds are healed scars remain. The wise man said of old, "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city."

Temperaments often clash in the family. There is the possibility of friction in households that are almost ideally beautiful and complete in their mutual relationship. Therefore it is necessary for us to be on the watch against our moods; to resist the temptation to fault-finding and to fretfulness is a positive duty. Equally and with greater determination we should resist what is the besetting sin of many—the tendency to be unforgiving.

Strangely enough, people are ready to defend themselves for having an unforgiving temper as though it were an evidence of a strong will and an upright character, while they do not hesitate to acknowledge that they are wrong in other and less harmful directions. "I am a good hater," one will say. "I have a long memory for injustice. I carried a stone in my pocket in the hope that I might some day have a chance to throw it, and the chance did not come for five years. Then I had my opportunity and I threw my missile and felt that I was even with the person who had tried to injure me."

This confession was calmly made by a Christian woman whose gentle manners and usually sweet disposition were in decided contrast with the vindictiveness she had cherished as if it were a merit. Apparently she fancied that to hold a grudge and keep a feud in the background of her mind was to do something for which she deserved praise. On the contrary, by so much as she had nursed her anger and fanned its flame, by the tenacity with which she had, as she said, "kept a stone in her pocket" to cast at the one who had wounded her, she showed herself deficient in the spirit of a true disciple.

What is the Christian law about forgiving an injury? What said our Master? When the question was asked him, "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?" he replied: "I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven." That is to say, the forgiveness of personal injuries must be indefinitely repeated; we must have in our hearts an intention to pardon those who injure us by word or deed, and we must do this to the uttermost extent of our powers in every-day life, in the little incidents of social intercourse. Beyond this, we must not only pardon those who offend us, but must love them enough to pray for them. Whoever forgives until seventy times seven will not forget to pray for the friend or the fancied enemy who has done him a wrong. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus told us that we could not pray acceptably or bring our gifts to the Lord while in our hearts there lingered a feeling of anger against a brother. "First be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." The Master himself gave the highest exemplification of the lofty tenderness that can pardon an infinite wrong when on the cross he exclaimed, in the wonderful prayer for his murderers, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Again and again in hours of anguish, prayers like this have been wafted to the skies from the lips of Christ's martyrs.

It is not so much in times of severe stress and strain that we need to cultivate this beautiful Christian grace, as amid the daily occasions for self-restraint and the little trials of daily life. The soul girds itself for a great conflict. The martyr's crown may never rest on our brow; but day by day we are called upon to carry, often unseen, some little cross. It may be too much to speak of forgiveness when a tired ticket agent answers us rudely, or a conductor forgets to stop the car at our corner, or somebody jostles us in the street; these are petty annoyances that do not amount to a grievance, yet they serve to disturb composure and overshadow our sunshine. Trifles light as these have been known to separate friends and set them apart.

"It is the little rift within the lute
That by and by shall make the music mute."

The beginnings of strife should be avoided. Never expect offenses, and if they come do not recognize them, is a good and safe rule. If they are forced upon you, forgive them as soon as possible. Having forgiven, speedily forget. One cannot put memory to a worse use than to make it the repository of resentment. Whoever declares, "I can forgive, but I cannot forget," has not been taught in the school of Christ.

The forgiving spirit is not a spirit of weakness, but a spirit of strength. Love is ever divine. Our dear Quaker poet, Whittier, struck a true chord in his noble lines:

To thee our full humanity,
Its joys and pains belong:
The wrong of man to man on thee
Inflicts a deeper wrong.

Who hates, hates thee, who loves becomes Therein to thee allied:
All sweet accords of hearts and homes
In thee are multiplied.

A FESTIVAL IN BRITTANY

BRITTANY, in the northwest of France, has had its local customs little changed by the currents of twentieth century life. Except in the cities, the men yet wear knee breeches, coats cut in the style of two centuries ago, and broad felt hats. Their gala costume is heavily embroidered. The women look as if they had just stepped from an old picture. The medieval festivals still flourish and bring the peasantry to the towns from far and near. It is hard to realize that but a few hours distant by rail is Paris, one of the most modern of cities.

International Marriages

ATTENTION has again been called to the subject of international marriages by the recent announcement that Miss Gladys Vanderpoel is engaged to a Hungarian Count with a [illegible] name, a proud ancestry, and unencumbered estates. Ordinarily a love match between two young people equally endowed with health and good temper, equally fitted for the best society, and equally supplied with wealth enough to satisfy the latest modern standards, would arouse no unfriendly comment. Nevertheless, it appears that objections have been freely raised and adverse criticisms made in the Count's native land because it is deemed there that he is condescending in making an alliance with an American girl who has no titles at her back. That the people of her family have been eminently worthy, and that its women are especially noted for gentle manners and sweet character, that she has had the education of a princess, and is as well fitted to shine in a European court as any maiden of Austria or Hungary, apparently makes no impression in the Count's own country.

The transplanting of an American girl from this blithe-hearted republic to a foreign land where she is to be received with suspicion, and accepted on approval, where it is doubtful whether the women of her husband's family will greet her with open arms, is an experiment that has hitherto failed of better than it has succeeded. Of course there have been happy marriages of the kind, but they have not been conspicuous. In numerous instances an impecunious nobleman has sought relief from embarrassment by wedding the daughter of an American millionaire. This case seems not to belong to that category.

In her brilliant novel, The Shuttle, Frances Hodgson Burnett has given a pitiful picture of the tragic results that may follow an ill-assorted marriage when a young wife is far from her kindred and friends, and is caught in a web from which she cannot escape.

"Will you walk into my parlor?"
Said the spider to the fly.
"'Tis the prettiest little parlor
That ever you did spy.
The way into my parlor
Is up a winding stair,
And I have many pretty things
To show you when you're there."

In The Shuttle a book well worth reading, Mrs. Burnett's spider is very big and black and belongs to the poisonous variety. Sir Nigel Austruthers is a villain of the deepest dye, and Rosalie Vanderpoel, his poor little bride, is a victim of circumstances and of a great mistake. Though conditions have altered since the period of Mrs. Burnett's story, the book is a suitable gift to be sent to American girls who are contemplating marriage with foreigners of whose antecedents and environment they know very little.

Her Birthday Gift

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received the book, "The Great Hereafter," which was ordered and sent to me by my daughter, wishing to give me a great pleasure on my eighty-eighth natal day.

It has been delayed, but the pleasure I expected from its perusal fully repays my impatience. I expected a great deal from the pen of the author. Let me now express my admiration of the liberal gift you have accorded your subscribers, and which I have very greatly enjoyed; also the pleasure I enjoy in reading the paper.

THE GOLDEN RULE SALOON

By Marion Earl

ALL day, Arthur brooded over the blow he had received the night before, and the impending discharge. All day he drank frequently and plotted revenge. He was stubborn in anger, and the liquor made him reckless and daring in his hate. That evening, his foe sauntered into the barroom, bent on making friends with Arthur. Instead of reciprocating, the latter poured forth a torrent of abuse. The end of the matter was that the old quarrel was resumed and Arthur drew a revolver from his pocket and fired. The young man who came in to settle a quarrel was taken away dead. Arthur spent the night behind the bars in the town jail.

When the mother heard the tidings, she swooned away and lay for days in the borderland close to death. She seemed without interest in life, till they roused her by telling her that he needed help in the trial which awaited him.

Marvin, the saloonkeeper, suddenly became her friend. He visited the house and offered to secure a lawyer to defend Arthur.

"It will cost at least a thousand dollars," he informed her.

"But I have no money, unless I sell the house."

"Yes, I know; but I'll furnish the rest of the money myself, if you want me to."

He went on to explain that if she would sign an agreement to give up the house, he would guarantee all the expense of the defense. It was money out of his pocket, but he was willing to do it for her. She was reluctant; but her mother-love won, and with trembling hand she attached her name that afternoon, before witnesses, to the document which conveyed the property to Marvin.

The true inwardness of the transaction was this: the saloonkeeper had secured the lawyer for the defense for five hundred dollars, which he agreed to pay out of his own pocket. He then purchased the account of the undertaker for half its face amount. To this he added the old bill for liquors, which he had presented to Mrs. Hood just after the funeral. To reimburse himself, he had the deed to the house, which was cheap at seven hundred dollars.

Some of her friends, who suspected his motives for friendliness, made inquiry; but the deed was signed and the matter so handled that nothing ever came of the attempt to right the wrong.

"She'll have to go to the poor-house anyway," was all the defense he made. He, however, allowed her to live in the house for five months. By no manipulation could he make his accounts go beyond $650. So he gave her the rent to make up the balance.

One day, in a burst of confidence, Marvin told Lee how he had managed to collect his old account. Fearful lest he give way to some emphatic expressions which came to his lips, the latter had turned away without a word.

There was still something manly in Lee, which revolted at the vulgar experience of the business. He took the saloon because it seemed to be a good financial opening. He was running it on "a business basis." True, he made frequent concessions to his conscience; but Marvin's utter abandon made it difficult for the Golden Rule Saloon to be run on the lines laid down at first. Lee could not turn trade to Marvin; that was not businesslike. So he relaxed at every point. But he was ill at ease. The murder committed in his place had unnerved him. He felt like abandoning the saloon; but it represented all the money he had, and it paid him well. So he compromised by resolving to be stricter in maintaining an orderly, "respectable place," which resolution he soon ignored.

And the Golden Rule Saloon still prospered, with an occasional drunken brawl and its never-ending panorama of human wretchedness.

CHAPTER IV

ANDY NEAL was one of Lee's best customers. He was a good blacksmith and earned fair wages when sober. But most of his money went in drink. Lee understood fully the suffering of the family from lack of food and Neal's abuse; he argued that the man would drink anyway, and he needed the money as much as Marvin did.

Neal and his cronies were talking of Arthur Hood's sentence, the evening after the news had come.

"He got twenty years in the pen, and I say he got off easy," were the words of an old sot.

"He ought to hang," another declared.

They retried the case for an hour, and the general feeling seemed to be that he deserved severe punishment. When some one suggested, as a defense, that the young man was drunk, the senator was emphatic in his rejoinder.

"That makes no difference! A man can drink and be a gentleman. I've always drank when I wanted to and I never harmed any man."

"Some men never do any harm, it may be," Neal answered, "but I'll tell you, men, there are some of this crowd that do things when drunk that they wouldn't when sober. It may not be murder, but it's no credit, that it ain't."

The argument was interrupted by the coming of one who had important news to tell.

"Had you heard about Mrs. Hood, Arthur's mother?"

The newcomer asked the question with the manner of one who was about to confer a favor.

"No, what is it?" the senator asked.

"She's gone plumb crazy. When she got the word about Arthur's sentence, she jest gave one awful scream and put her hand to her head, like something had gone wrong there, and she's as crazy as a loon."

"Poor soul! It would have been a mercy to her to have died years ago," Neal said with great feeling.

The others discussed the case at length, but he sat silently with his face in his hands, his mind busy with shapes from the past which always caused him suffering whenever they rose like spectres from their burial place.

He drank that night with unusual freedom, as if trying to drown all recollection. The excess was so pronounced that Lee finally refused to sell him more liquor, and then put him out and told him to go home. Instead of obeying the injunction, he went to Marvin's Place and drank still more.

It was long past midnight when Lee closed the saloon and started home. As he approached Andy Neal's house a woman, hatless and disheveled, ran out of the yard and started down the street toward him.

"Andy's goin' to kill Lucy! He's drunk!" she gasped. "He's tied her with a rope an' dragged her over to the shop."

She pointed, frantic with terror, to the blacksmith shop that stood just beyond the house. Lee waited for nothing, but ran to the place indicated. He tried the doors; they were locked. The window on the side—a mere opening in the boards of the wall, covered at times with an old blanket—caught his eye as he hastened toward the rear. He paused an instant to look in. A dimly burning lantern hung on the wall. Lucy lay securely bound on the forge. Across the room the father was stooping over the grindstone, trying to put a keen edge on an old carving-knife. She lay all silent now. He had stopped her piteous cries by stuffing a handkerchief into her mouth.

The saloonkeeper crawled in as stealthily as possible. In picking up an iron bar from the floor he made a noise at which the blacksmith turned to look, and then sprang to the side of his victim on the forge. He raised a warning hand as the intruder, with bar upraised, took a step forward.

"Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground!" Neal said in a theatrical, hoarse whisper. "Shall a man give the fruit of his body for the sin of his soul?" he continued. "God has demanded this of me. My sins are so great that nothing else can ever make atonement."

Lee had stopped as the other began to speak. Now he took another step forward.

"Go back!" cried the would-be murderer. "If you come near I will kill you!" The knife was raised threateningly while the eyes glittered with strange fire.

For answer, the iron bar was lifted and Lee sprang forward. His antagonist was disarmed after a brief struggle, and the girl was saved. Neal had gone home after a night of carousing, possessed with the idea that God had given him the strange command. Dragging Lucy from her bed, he had tried to obey the delusion of his crazed brain. She was bruised and one leg was broken by the rough treatment. The nervous shock in itself was enough to wellnigh kill her. She lay in bed for many weeks a patient sufferer.

The keeper of the Golden Rule Saloon genuinely sympathized with the family—and with Lucy and the mother in particular. He advised the father to keep out of the saloons entirely. "You see, if you come, we can't refuse to sell you liquor; or if I did, Marvin wouldn't. You say you could let it alone, if it wasn't for the saloon. I say, keep away and you won't get into trouble."

The advice was sincere enough, but it was without knowledge. What the magnet is to iron filings, the saloon is to some men. They cannot resist the attraction. Neal did succeed in keeping sober for some weeks, however. Lee called frequently at the house to inquire after Lucy.

There was another regular caller at the humble home of the Neals. May Johnson had for a long time taken a special interest in the mother and daughter. Since the affair in the shop that night, she had spent a great deal of time in trying to make the girl's sufferings as light as possible. One morning as Lee was entering the yard, Miss Johnson was just leaving the house. There was no way to avoid a meeting.

"Good morning, Mr. Lee," she said, in the same old quiet tone with which he was so familiar.

He was passing on with a low-voiced good morning, without looking into her face, when she interrupted him.

"Just a moment, please! I was wondering if you would help me a little. Lucy is not as well this morning, and she thinks some fresh fish would taste good. She doesn't eat much of anything. I was wondering if you could find some one to go fishing to-day."

He looked up into her face for an instant, then quickly dropped his eyes.

"I think I can manage that," he said. Then, as if trying to divert his thoughts from something unpleasant, he went on: "It's such a pity that Lucy has to suffer so. I'd think her father would lie awake nights thinking of what he did that night. It's too bad!"

She walked away. He was not angry t the words. CHAPTER V

THE orgies of the nightly life at the Golden Rule Saloon were in full blast. The glasses clinked on the marble-topped bar, here the proprietor was kept constantly busy. Beyond the wide, high chway was the gaming department, led with brilliant light, tobacco smoke, e click of billiard balls, occasional isterous laughter and bad odors. In e barroom proper was a crowd that lked and laughed and smoked bad gars and worse pipes. An occasional ng rang out above the other noises of bauchery. In this last company sat ndy Neal, flushed with liquor. He had en lured into Marvin's Place, where had become thoroughly intoxicated. or some reason he had left early and w was back to his favorite corner beind the heater, in an upholstered chair. Suddenly a woman, tall, slender, her ng, white hair loose and streaming, a eet folded and thrown over her shoulrs, the corners held in the tight clasp a bony hand, stood in the midst beeen the stove and the bar. She had tered so swiftly and quietly that no one emed to be aware of her presence till ey saw her standing silent in the om. Talking and laughing ceased. en withdrew the pipes and cigars from eir mouths to look. Quickly conscious the change, the men at the gaming bles looked up and became still. The truder stood for a moment in seeming wilderment. She looked around the om and walked toward the bar. It as noticed that she was without shoes, d that there were holes in her stockgs. She turned her wildly flashing ze full into Lee's face.

"I want my boy!" she cried in tones that rang and penetrated to every corner of the place.

Lee, quick to take in the situation, replied calmly, "I don't think he is here. I don't see anything of him. Do you?"

The sheet slipped from her thinly clad shoulders and dropped to the floor, one corner still clutched in the wasted hand. The right arm shot forward and the long finger pointed into his face, while the flash in the eye made him shudder.

"I want my boy!" she repeated. The sheet lay on the floor now, and both arms were outstretched in pleading. "I used to hold him in these arms and rock him to sleep. Oh, he was such a good boy! But you murdered his father and left him an orphan. Yes, you did; you caught him in this man-trap of yours and killed him. And then you took my boy and made a murderer of him, and shut him in a cell."

She took a step toward him. Impulsively he grasped the neck of a tall bottle that stood within reach.

"Oh!" she cried, and tears were in the voice, "I am so lonesome out there at the farm. They say I am crazy, but give me back my boy and I'll be all right again."

Lee made a move as if to come nearer.

"Stay where you are," she commanded.

He stood still.

"You can't give me back my boy, but you can stop trying to put other boys where Arthur is. He never touched the drink till you tempted him in here. They wouldn't, either. But you've got to have the boys or you can't do business. These old sots will die pretty soon!" She waved a hand and cast a glance toward the men in the corner. "But if you were not a bad man, you wouldn't do it. This is a slaughter-house, and you are a butcher!"

The voice rose to a high pitch in the last declaration. For an instant the form swayed. She took a few tottering steps forward and leaned against the bar.

For Missionaries' Children

REV. F. E. MEIGS, M.A., President of Union Christian College, Nankin, China, is now in the United States in the interest of a school to be established in the valley of the Yang-tse-kiang for the education of missionaries' children. Of the forty evangelical societies, whose 4,000 workers are scattered over the vast Chinese Empire, only one society, namely, the China Inland Mission, maintains a school in China for the education of its children. The remaining societies, embracing some 3,200 missionaries, are wholly destitute of such provision.

The missionaries have tried to cope with this serious disability by themselves conducting the primary instruction of their children, under many disadvantages. Dr. Meigs' plan looks to the establishment and adequate equipment of an institution in China, in which the children of all missionaries in that land can be educated, from the kindergarten stage up to the college entrance. The school will be interdenominational. At a mountain resort called Kuling, 3,500 feet above the plain, near Kiukiang, a model settlement of about 250 houses has grown up. Not less than 1,000 foreigners, mostly missionaries and their families, go there annually to recuperate. Three years ago it was decided to found at Kuling a tentative school for the children. A guarantee fund was subscribed, and the institution opened in 1906. The Board of Directors includes a number of the most prominent missionaries. It proved satisfactory, and it is now desired to place the school on a solid financial basis, thus providing for its perpetuity and enlargement. With this object in view, Mr Meigs has come to America to raise a fund of $100,000, for buildings and endowment. He will be glad to supply all information to those who may address him at Room 808, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Old Fashioned Girls
By Our Modern Artists

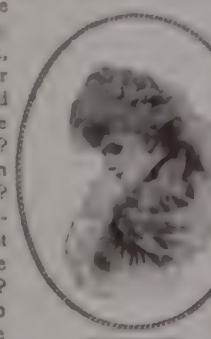
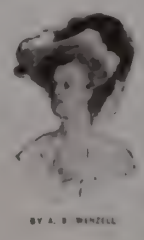
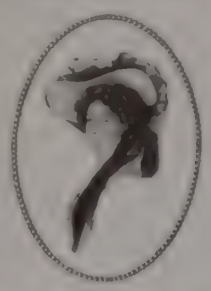
By MARY JANE [illegible]

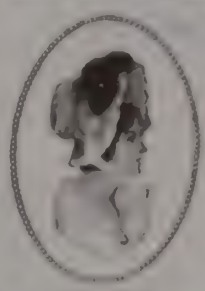
¶ If you were to attempt to picture your idea of an old fashioned girl, how would you depict her? Would she have a curl nestling alongside the curve of her neck, tantalizingly tempting her admirers gently to lift it and kiss the soft, pinky-white flesh against which it rests? Would she be a Dolly Varden type, daintily graceful? Would she be a sedate Colonial dame in Quaker bonnet and sober dress? Would she be a Pompadour beauty? Perhaps you will be able to find your ideal amongst the collection of "Old-Fashioned Girls" issued by Armour & Company in the form of a Calendar as their 1908 contribution to American art. Five prominent American artists have endeavored to picture their ideals. A. B. Wenzell, C. Allan Gilbert, Henry Hutt, Harrison Fisher and F. S. Manning have succeeded in producing a veritable chef d'Oeuvre. Considered either as a collection or singly, the pictures are pronounced by art connoisseurs to be a valuable addition to the artistic achievements of the year. The manner in which they may be obtained is mentioned below.





¶ A gulf wider than time separates the old-fashioned woman from her twentieth century sister. Our grandmothers and their grandmothers before them were taught all the intricacies of brewing and baking. There was nothing about the art culinary they did not know how to do, whereas the average woman of today does not know enough about practical cookery to prepare the simplest meal.

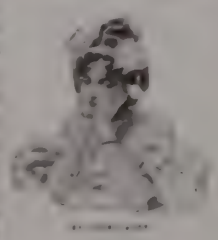




¶ Extract of Beef (especially Armour's) is one of the new-fashioned things that help the conscientious woman of today to [illegible] and solve the [illegible] problems. The old-fashioned woman was accustomed to [illegible] the very life out of the beef when in order to secure the extract of beef. The operation required more than [illegible] hours—it took days—many days—hanging over a steaming soup pot skimming and stirring until the meat was boiled out of the woman as well as the skin.

¶ The twentieth century woman dips a spoon into a tiny jar of Armour's Extract of Beef, stirs it about in the pot containing the other ingredients and the soup is made.

¶ The old-fashioned woman knew nothing about the use of beef for flavoring and coloring purposes. The woman of today knows that Armour's Extract of Beef not only colors the gravy, but adds to the intensity of the browned meat taste.



¶ This beautiful Calendar will be sent on receipt of twenty-five cents in stamps, or in exchange for one metal cap from jar of Armour's Extract of Beef, accompanied by four cents for postage. If desired, the "Old Fashioned Girls" may be secured without calendar during the advertising. These are printed on extra large special paper, and are suitable for framing or portfolio purposes. The entire set will be sent, express prepaid, for [illegible] dollar, or single pictures will be furnished for twenty-five cents

AS A MISSIONARY AGENCY it is most successful and economical. Its colporters circulate Bibles, books and tracts, and do pioneer mission work. It carries the gospel directly to soldiers, sailors, miners and the inmates of hospitals, prisons and asylums.

IT IS PRACTICAL AND EFFECTIVE for evangelizing the immense number of foreign-speaking immigrants, of whom 1,200,000 arrived last year, presenting to them the gospel in 34 languages.

IT IS MOST EFFICIENT in reaching the Roman Catholic population of America with the truths of the gospel in uncontroversial form.

IT PUBLISHES IN SPANISH for the fifty-two million people in South and Central America, Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines.

ITS CHRISTIAN LITERATURE in 173 languages, dialects or characters, is the right arm of all foreign missionaries.

Since September 1, 1907, three new departments have been organized:

For SLAVIC COLPORTAGE, with 20 workers;
For ITALIAN COLPORTAGE, with 51 workers;
For SOUTHERN COLPORTAGE, with 20 workers (largely among the negroes).

The Society plans to enlarge each department as rapidly as competent workers can be secured and the means are provided.

It is wholly dependent on donations and legacies

TISSOT'S WONDROUS ART

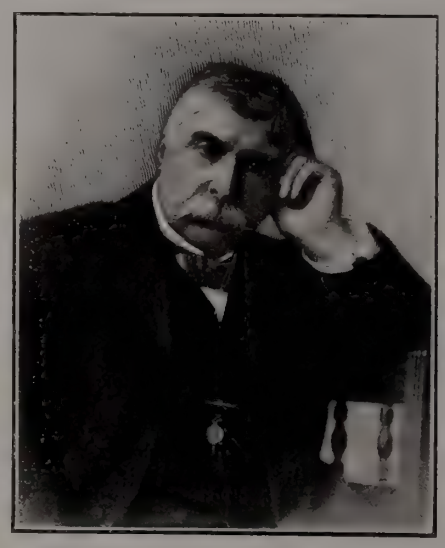
WITHIN the last few years, Americans have become familiar with the art work of J. James Tissot, whose remarkable series of paintings of the Holy Land and its people have won him world-wide fame and placed him in the very front rank of the painters of Oriental life. It is the purpose of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to make its readers better acquainted with the art of this great master, who stands to-day without a rival as a pictorial interpreter of the people and events of Old and New Testament times. Tissot's life-work is the illumination of Bible history. It is true, the same inviting field has been chosen by many great painters in the past. But Tissot differs from all other painters who have preceded him. And in order clearly to understand just wherein this vital difference lies, and to comprehend the motives that led Tissot to take up his special life-work, we give below a brief outline of his career.



J. James Tissot

Twenty years ago Tissot, then a man of fifty, was the foremost painter of modern Parisian life. Born in France, of a family of means and social position, he studied his art under Ingres, Flandrin, Lamothe, and other eminent teachers of that day. At thirty he was already a medalist. Many of his early compositions were bought by the French Government and placed in the public galleries. He went to England, where he was the intimate friend of Sir Alma Tadema, and for twelve years he was the acknowledged leader in genre work and portraiture in that country.

It was not until he returned to Paris, however, that the great change took place which transformed Tissot's whole career and induced him to abandon all the artistic relations he had hitherto held as so precious, and to consecrate himself, like Sir Galahad of the Grail, to the pursuit of one great central spiritual idea. If ever painter was called to a holy mission, it was he. It was while he was worshiping in the grand old church of St. Sulpice, in the French capital, that the revelation came. He had a vision of Christ; the Saviour with bleeding hands beckoned to him, and in his heart he heard the insistent call to a higher mission and a holier and nobler art.

Tissot now painted with redoubled zeal. His splendid canvas, "Christ Amid the Ruins," was produced at this time; but though it won the admiration of two continents, it fell short of the artist's great ideal. He resolved to go to Palestine, where, amid the people and the scenes beloved by the Saviour, he would find the true types for his canvas and the atmosphere and inspiration he needed.

In 1886 he took up his pilgrim staff and began his new life as a simple art student in the Messiah's country. The next sixteen years were passed in the Holy Land, with the exception of a few short intervals. With unwearying fidelity, he studied the land and the people. He became also an ardent student of the Bible and was an intense inquirer after all that related to the marvelous story of Christ's earthly pilgrimage. With infinite patience, he exhausted all the sources of information as to the costumes, character, customs and architecture of that bygone age. He lived it all over again, mingling with the people, eating their food, thinking their thoughts and sharing in the life and action of the time to an extent which no other artist or student is known to have attempted.

Tissot's spiritual nature was now fully awakened. The artist-worshiper felt gradually unfolding before him the true story of the ancient life of that wonderful land. His brush was now busy incessantly. As he went up and down throughout Syria and Egypt, he entered into the life of the people and became as one of themselves. He absorbed the very spirit of the East, and became saturated with its traditions, its folklore, its myths and its world-old legends. He felt himself thus enabled to trace back through successive generations, the various human types of those countries; for in all mundane things—in manners, customs, dress, and even in language—the East changes slowly. Tissot held in his master-hand the secrets of the generations, and he transferred these to canvas in a series of paintings which have no parallel in the history of art. In those sixteen years he finished no less than eight hundred pictures, which stand to-day as a complete presentation of the leading personalities of Old and New Testament times. Prophets, priests, kings, queens, princes, warriors and shepherds are there. It is not dead canvas, but a living procession which this inspired painter marshals before us. We see here the first patriarchs and their simple pastoral surroundings. We witness the building of the Ark, and are with Noah and his sons on their miraculous voyage. We watch the uprearing of Babel; we follow the career of Abraham and the beautiful idyl of Jacob and Rachel, as well as that of Isaac and Rebecca. We view, like a brilliant and vivid panorama, the wonderful incidents of Joseph's rise to power, and we are fascinated spectators of the magnificence of the ancient court of the Pharaohs. We march through the Red Sea with Moses and the triumphant host of Israel, and see the overwhelmed chariots of Egypt sink to rise no more. We sojourn with the new nation in the wilderness of Sinai, and we can almost hear the thunders from the "Mount of the Law." In all the conquests and reverses of the Israelites we have a part; we witness with awe the downfall of Ai and Jericho, and we share the last great vision of Moses. We cross the Jordan with the divinely led host, and are participants in the stirring scenes in which Gideon, Jephthah, Samson and the great warriors of the time of the Judges took part. Next comes into view the long and stately line of Israelitish kings, from Saul and David and Solomon,

"THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND"

WE all know the "captains of men," and many of us have heard their commanding voices; but the rare experience of knowing the peacemakers, the meek, the merciful, does not come to us all.

At eighteen, Jacob Huntsinger selected his calling in life. The career he chose did not furnish him with a precedent, for none had engaged in it exclusively before him. He found one great example in sacred history which inspired him to adopt it and follow it; but the example was merely an incident in the work of the Saviour on earth. "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," wrought the resolution in the soul of the young man. For fifty years Jacob Huntsinger has been known in half a dozen States as the "Children's Friend."

Jacob Huntsinger
"The Children's Friend"

He is now seventy-one years old, or, if one might be allowed to say it, is seventy-one years young.

This strange man has never changed from his first methods of pursuing his work. He set out on his first mission on foot, and has done so until this day. He walks through the pleasant country lanes and in the streets of villages, and wherever he meets a child—black, white, poor or rich—he accosts it and seeks to become acquainted. Lonely farms and hamlets have received him with gladness. He never fails to win a child's confidence. He kindly greets every child he sees, and he has never knowingly passed one by in city, town or country without addressing it. He always gives a little present, and no matter how many children he finds in a group, his capacious pockets hold a gift for every one. It may be a picture, a tiny book, a bright disc with a word or text stamped thereon, or a present to be carried home to mother. This "Children's Friend" is wise in his methods, for he courts every means to reach his ends, and often finds a little present to a mother more effective than to bestow his attentions upon the child alone. His one object is to direct the mind of the children toward the truths of the Bible, and to get them early interested in the way of right living. He goes about doing good, for not only children receive his ministering, but any person who may need him.

For fifty-three years this work has been going on, and many localities in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan and Kansas have known the "Children's Friend." He is as active to-day as he ever was; he has passed the three-score years and ten.

In following his chosen line of work, Mr. Huntsinger has preached in many pulpits, addressed Sunday Schools without number, and testified in meetings of every description. As a Sunday School evangelist he is welcomed everywhere, for he inspires teachers and scholars to greater devotion and energy. Long ago he was ordained to preach, but he never held a charge.

Replying recently to the question if he felt that his efforts were worth while, he said that he had the conviction they were. Many grown persons, who remember his influence on their childhood and subsequent years, support him in that claim. His present home is at Huntington, Indiana.

own to the Babylonian conquest. The oble and impressive Biblical drama of ob, the wondrously beautiful story of uth, the patriotism of Esther, are all epicted with a richness of color and an rtistic touch that cannot be adequately escribed.

Tissot's Old Testament paintings consti- ute a complete artistic history of the Bible, om the Creation to Malachi, the last of e prophets. Of the latter, seventeen are ortrayed in paintings so full of character nd so faithful to the spirit and manner of e time in which these inspired men of od lived and labored, that this series lone might be regarded as a magnificent iumph of art. But there is no standard f comparison whereby we may estimate e value of Tissot's work, in contrast ith that of other painters. He stands lone, the one realist whose consecrated enius has lifted the curtain of the ages nd brought back to our living senses the le of a long hidden past.

We wish it were possible to convey to e reader an idea of the beauty and acefulness of Tissot's work, at once so ll of delicacy and strength. His women e true types of the East—dark, large- ed, lissome. No other painter has given women just like these. The men of triarchal days are a realistic revelation rugged strength and forceful charac- r. His scenes of Oriental grandeur are surpassed, and his use of color is bold nd original, yet never in excess of nature. is thorough study of costume, customs, nd general surroundings leaves no room r the charge of anachronism.

Tissot succeeded where others had iled because he knew the East, and made its people the study of his maturer life. He saw how the Bible lands had been misapprehended and misinterpreted. He saw how the German painters had given to the world a Teutonic Christ; the Anglo-Saxon painters an English Christ; and the Flemish, French, Spanish and Italian painters each a Christ who is an idealized interpretation of the divine face as seen through the lenses of their own national schools of art. Beautiful they are, yet they are not Christ. Tissot's Christ is a Syrian Christ, native of the soil of Palestine. His disciples, and all their surroundings, are true, living, breathing types of the Orient.

It is not surprising, therefore, that Tissot's work as a whole should appeal with special force to all Bible lovers and to those who are interested in Old and New Testament history. To the pastor, the student, the Sunday School teacher, these beautiful Bible pictures are invaluable, not only as works of art but as a complete chronological pictorial Bible history. They are the very embodiment of the life and action of Bible times and shed a new and beautiful light on the inspired page. We learn that the American Tissot Society, which controls this great collection, has consented to have them reproduced in the form of a complete series, in colors, for the use of Sunday Schools. As the best Pictorial Bible Commentary ever produced, they should quickly find their way into every Sunday School and Christian home throughout the land.

The Industrial Savings and Loan Co., is an institution of proved integrity, large capital and long established reputation. They possess and offer certain distinct advantages which people with moderate sums to invest should inquire about. Notice their advertisement on page 975.

Temperance Tour of the World

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

PAUL teaches us first, as the Revision puts it, to "abstain from every form of evil." And surely the beverage sale of intoxicants, which Gladstone said had "done the world more harm than war, pestilence and famine," is a "form of evil." No one has a moral right to do anything that, if the world should follow his example, as some are sure to do, would produce more harm than good. To take the pledge to-day will put your example where it can do no harm if all the world should follow it.

And this saying brings in Paul's main argument, that we should abstain for the sake of others. Paul also gives the best method of displacing a propensity to drink: "Be not overcome of wine, but be filled with the Spirit." At Pentecost the apostles were charged with intoxication, but the new wine with which their souls were filled was not of earth, but from heaven, and gave them strength and gladness that did not, as in the case of alcohol, turn speedily to weakness and sorrow.

But Jesus promised that after the New Testament days, those who believed in him should do and say "greater things" than men could bear while he was on earth. To-day he is doing and saying some of those "greater things" from heaven and the nations are listening to him, and are obeying consciously or unconsciously the principles he laid down. Illustrations of that fact drawn from eleven different countries we give on this World's Temperance Sunday, which together will constitute a Temperance Tour of the World of to-day.

Great Britain

It is passing strange that the race that has been foremost in giving the world religious and civil liberty has been the worst in the world in alcoholic enslavement of its own people. And no less strange is it that after a thousand years of vain effort by moderation and taxation to check this drink curse, which, as Parliament has recognized, is producing "national degeneracy," the same old restrictions that do not restrict are being repeated over and over again.

The most hopeful signs in Britain are: that abstainers are increasing, and that a majority of the present Parliament have declared for local option, which, however, is likely to be long in coming and to be handicapped not only by the provision of "compensation" for the saloonkeepers to the full value of their business when they are closed out, but also by the requirement of a three-fifths majority. The worst man or measure can be elected under the accepted doctrine of majority rule by one majority, but three-fifths of the total vote on three or more propositions is required to suppress in the United Kingdom the worst foe of the home, of honest business and of pure politics, toward which for these three reasons the attitude of government should be that of hostility.

France

Revenue statistics gathered from all civilized governments through British and American consuls in the twentieth century show that while France drinks more wine than any other country—and the best wine, for it is out of their own vineyards, before the general adulteration, which has caused the recent riots of French wine growers, is undertaken—France also drinks more distilled liquors per capita than any other country, a complete refutation of the theory that a free use of wine would crowd out whisky. (Germany teaches the same lesson as to beer.)

But France also has given the temperance forces of the world a banner for the vanguard, inscribed with "Alcoholism," rather than "Drunkenness," as the foe to be fought. In posters put up by city governments in France, which British cities have copied with improvements, France proclaims to the world that daily tippling which falls short of drunkenness produces the chronic alcoholic poisoning known to capable physicians as "alcoholism," which, though it may not be as dangerous as drunkenness to the drinkers' neighbors, is more likely to blight his own health and that of his children's children.

Scandinavia

Amateurs in temperance work think of Scandinavia as the home of the "Gothenburg System," which is supposed to have removed about all the evils of the liquor traffic, namely, those arising from private cupidity, inducing people to drink more and oftener than they would if left to act on their own impulses. It has been assumed that there would be no cupidity to promote drinking if the barkeepers were hired by the State or a company expecting only four per cent. dividend instead of an individual owner, and the profits were divided among taxpayers and philanthropic and religious institutions. But surely one must have very little knowledge of human nature who thinks it is "disinterested management" to substitute the widespread cupidity of bondholders and officeholders and tax-payers and philanthropists for the concentrated cupidity of a few liquor dealers. It is like scattering the bad blood of a boil through the whole system, instead of lancing it.

The argument for the "Gothenburg System," because of a reduction in liquor consumption in Norway since this system was introduced, is a bad case of the logical fallacy "after, therefore because of" (post hoc, ergo propter hoc), as was proved at the anniversary of the stalwart Scottish Temperance Society in Glasgow, in 1906, by a member of Parliament, who showed that a reduction similar to that of Norway had occurred in the neighboring country of Denmark, which has no Gothenburg system. The decline in both was manifestly due in the main to causes working to like degree in both, namely, to the increase of total abstinence and local prohibition. Indeed, Gothenburg itself has given up the system there originated for local prohibition, which is now the "Gothenburg System." Government ownership on the dispensary plan has also proved a failure, under trial in South Carolina, and "disinterested management" was also weighed and found wanting in a saloon in New York. Russia has also tried government ownership, but has only made matters worse.

Central Europe

Although beer drinking shows little if any abatement in Central Europe, the medical professors there are leading the learned world in investigations of alcohol, and especially of beer, which they proclaim to be promotive of Bright's disease and other kidney troubles, of dropsy also, and rheumatism and tuberculosis. Professor Forel, after a tour of the United States, spoke of the ignorance he found among American college professors as to recent scientific investigations of alcohol. Indeed, only one American professor is quoted in a continental poster giving the opinions of learned men on alcohol, and he is quoted only to show that he claims it is a food only in the sense that it is a fuel, and admits that it is a very dangerous fuel.

Africa

Three times the great nations of the world have held conferences in Brussels, in 1890, 1899 and 1906, to counteract the "moral and material injury wrought by the liquor traffic" in Africa. In 1890 they established a prohibitory zone in the Congo country, forbidding all sales of distilled liquors in that zone, with most salutary results, as is admitted even by those who have found most occasion to attack the management of that country. This plan of establishing a by decorating each room with Alabastine in perfect color harmony with its furnishings. Alabastine comes in dry powdered form, and when mixed with cold water anyone can easily apply it to any surface. It hardens and sets to the wall, becoming a part of it, and will neither rub nor wear off, nor fade.

Alabastine is more durable, more artistic and more economical than wall paper, tapestry, kalsomine, or any other wall coating material. Germs or insects cannot thrive where it is used. Different tints can be applied one over the other, season after season, without the bother or expense of washing or scraping the walls, thus reducing the cost of re-decorating at least one-half.

Send 10 cents coin or stamps for the book, "Dainty Wall Decorations," beautifully illustrated in colors, showing the new art decorations for homes, schools and churches, and containing working plans and valuable suggestions for interior decoration. It explains how easy it is and how little it costs to make any home an artistic success. Tint cards free on request.

Alabastine is sold in carefully sealed and properly labeled packages by all paint and oil, drug, hardware and general stores, at 50c the package for white, 55c for tints. A package will cover from 300 to 450 square feet, according to the nature of the surface.

prohibitory zone, which the Americans have also followed in the Indian Territory, we believe is the right one for all countries where a majority of the inhabitants are of the child races.

It is not enough to forbid the sales to natives, as is abundantly proved in Fiji to-day, where such a law is easily and frequently violated. Much less is it sufficient to raise the tax, which was the foolish and ineffective policy adopted for Africa by the Brussels Conference of 1899. This did not even check the rapid increase of liquor consumption and its consequences, and yet raising the tax again was all that was accomplished in Brussels in 1906. To that conference of nations, however, President Roosevelt sent a proposal that may be adopted later when the tax failure has been sufficiently shown: that the civilized nations shall unitedly forbid all sales of intoxicants and opium to all uncivilized and newly civilized races.

Western and Central Asia

Dr. Henry Jessup, the veteran missionary in Beirut, said to a shipload of American travelers: "I have been in Turkey nearly fifty years, and I never saw a drunken Turkish soldier; but within two hours of the time when an American or British ship has entered our harbor, the streets are filled with the wild uproar of drunken sailors." Mohammedanism is a total abstinence religion, as are Hinduism and Buddhism also. We believe Christianity is no less a total abstinence religion, for God has commanded us to "abstain from every form of evil." But we must admit that professing Christians, better in other respects than the devotees of any heathen faith, have been far more frequently guilty of buying and selling intoxicating beverages.

A few Mohammedans and Hindus and Buddhists have been led to drink by the white man's example and influence, but in Turkey and Persia and other Mohammedan countries the masses are still abstainers, and in the world campaign against drink and opium that is developing they will be valuable allies. In India, for example, there are hundreds of temperance societies in which Hindus, Buddhists, Mohammedans and Christians are unitedly fighting the licensed drink shops by which the government most unwisely is allowing the one supreme virtue of the native faiths to be trampled on, to the grievous offense of the best native citizens, and that too at a time when occasions for criticism of the government and incentives to social unrest should be most carefully avoided.

China

ranks first in the world in prohibition of the sale and use of intoxicants, which Mr. Wu Ting Fang, when recently Chinese Minister to the United States, told me had been the general policy of China since the fourth century. In some reigns the use of the simple native wines was allowed at festivals, when they were taken more as a confection than as an intoxicant. Indeed, drunkenness among the Chinese is so infrequent that President James B. Angell, after serving as American Minister in China, said he "did not see three drunken Chinamen in a year." We found but two temperance societies in China, one for British soldiers, the other for children in an American mission. But beer, largely of American introduction, is coming in just as opium is being suppressed in all Eastern Asia by a joint commission of China, Japan, Great Britain and the United States. The supreme peril of China's future, next to political corruption, is beer, against which China should be warned by distribution of literature.

Japan

has given the world the most perfect example of legal prohibition in its anti-opium law. When the Philippine Opium Committee studied the Asiatic laws on opium and their results, they reported that revenue killed restriction wherever the two objects were combined in one measure, and that Japan alone was successful in anti-opium legislation, which was attributed to the fact that in Japan proper the sale and use of opium has long been prohibited, except under carefully guarded medical prescription, with no attempt to get any revenue whatever.

Although Japan has a long coast, and a large value of this drug can be concealed in a very small space—for example, in the hollow of a bamboo cane or fish-pole—such smuggling, which often occurs in Australia, is almost unheard of in Japan, and the severest critics of Japan in her ports admit that the enforcement of the law is almost perfect. It shows what can be done by a vigorous government when revenue is not involved.

All this is of importance to Americans, for Congress allowed the Philippine government three years, ending March 1, 1908, to gradually reduce the opium selling and opium using there, but a great revenue has totally prevented any tapering off, and may make a hard battle necessary in the Congress about to meet to prevent extension beyond that date. Prisoners stop their opium at once, and both the tapering and the revenue fallacies should be turned down hard. Japan's greatest peril, like China's, is from the introduction of the American beer saloon.

Australia

Australia's agreeable climate, which escapes the extremes of heat and cold, and its atmosphere, which is like champagne "extra dry," and affords all the stimulant any one needs, and invites to outdoor life all the year, removes all excuse for drinking any form of so-called stimulants there, but there are few countries where men take a "nip" of whisky more frequently. Local option, however, starting in New Zealand, in spite of the handicap of a three-fifths majority requirement, is putting new areas every year under "no license." It is also encouraging that the importation of opium has recently been prohibited, at considerable sacrifice of revenue, and that some anti-gambling laws, encouraging though inadequate, have been passed.

Canada

Of all the large geographical divisions of the world, Canada has not only the best Sabbath observance, but also the smallest per capita consumption of liquors—about four gallons a year—less than one-fourth the figure for the United States, whose per capita consumption of both the milder and stronger intoxicants is only half that of Britain and Germany. In plebiscites to test public sentiment, nearly all the provinces of Canada have declared in favor of complete prohibition, but have been cheated out of it by political leaders, and are now seeking to make the best of imperfect forms of local option, meantime pressing vigorously efforts to win individuals to total abstinence.

United States

The United States, the leader of the movements for total abstinence and prohibition, is consuming more intoxicants per capita than ever before, but there are two signs of promise. One of these is the decisions of Indiana courts that a saloon, because it is a cause of disorder, poverty and crime, is a "nuisance" that can be abated as such under common law, and which, as such, has no right to a license, under the principle announced by the United States Supreme Court in the Louisiana Lottery case, that "the Legislature cannot bargain away the public health or the public morals. The people themselves cannot do it, much less their rulers." The other sign of promise is the steady growth of "No license" or local prohibition. In foreign lands where prohibition fights are on, sophists seek to give the impression that prohibition is declining in the United States because the number of prohibition States has decreased. But we have had occasion to reply that it is only a change of method from State prohibition to local prohibition, which, in the typical case of Georgia, has grown to State prohibition. The great need at present is that Congress should withdraw the federal shield of inter-state commerce from "blind tigers" fed with "original packages" by liquor dealers outside the State.

HEART RIGHT

It Makes a Great Difference

"About two years ago I became alarmed because my husband had attacks from fainting spells caused by weak heart, from drinking coffee.

"At first he did not like Postum. I had not then learned to boil it long as directions say, to get the rich flavor and brown color.

"After it was made right, he liked it, and now for more than a year he has not been troubled with his heart—in fact, his general health is better than for years." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

The Evil of Intoxicants*

WHEN we think of the evil of strong drink, we are apt to choose as an illustration the drunkard staggering homeward, maudlin, pugnacious and silly. But this is the closing view; the real evil lies further back. Strong drink has done its work at that stage and shows us the finished product. We know, and the drunkard knows, the evil then; no one can dispute it. It is patent and open and undisguised. There is no boy or man in his senses who voluntarily and designedly sets out to reach that end. He would be horrified and indignant if some one told him that he would ever become such a creature. He says the man must be weak, he is certainly foolish and he is partially demented. No one can persuade him that there is any danger of himself falling into such bondage. Probably the drunkard himself, in his sober moments, can remember talking in that way, or at least feeling that way, before he became the thing he is. This has been going on for centuries and we learn from the fact that the craving for strong drink is insidious. If we could have a vision of society thirty or forty years ahead, we should see the army of drunkards still numerous, and among them some who are now boasting of their self-control and unconscious of the fate awaiting them. It becomes us all to ask as did the disciples at the last supper, "Lord, is it I?"

The thought that some of the boys and young men with whom we talk and whom we meet in familiar intercourse will be in that shameful army, suggests not only vigilance for ourselves, but earnest warning for them. Parents, Sunday School teachers, employers, Christian men in all relations, have a duty to young people in this matter. The parent who has beer or wine on his table, who drinks in moderation himself and has never been intoxicated in his life, is the real source of danger. The pastor or the teacher who drinks, but never to excess, is the man who is the tempter's most valuable ally. The boy notices him, quotes him and follows his respectable example. All might be well if he had the sturdy, vigorous nature of the man he follows. He is in no danger of following the example of the drunkard. He sees that there are some men who can drink and be moderate, and knows not that he not one of them. The responsibility of setting such an example is grave. We shall never get rid of the evil nor reduce the number of victims until abstinence becomes a matter of conscience.

Work Among Immigrants*

NEVER was a nation confronted with so vast a problem as that which the United States faces in the tide of immigration which has set toward these shores for many years past. During the past twelve months more than a million persons arrived from over sea, and the prospect is of still larger numbers for the coming year. They are of all races and of all religions. The question is forced upon us, whether in adding so large a number to our population, we are not incurring a danger of changing the character of our institutions. The majority of the immigrants know little of the principles of our government; they simply know that this is a good country in which to get money, and that here there is no emperor or king or aristocracy to oppress them. All else must be taught them if they are to be absorbed without injury into our population.

As we have learned by a recent series of outrages, there are immigrants who bring with them their old ideas of the means of redressing injuries, and of getting even with an enemy. The injustice that the native American bears patiently until he finds constitutional means of rectifying it, drives the immigrant to violent measures. He has to be taught self-control, respect for law and regard for the rights of others. He finds liberty here in such large dose, that he is liable to become intoxicated with it. He cannot understand that there is a law of liberty which is necessary to prevent its becoming license, and that in his own interest and that of the community it must be obeyed.

Besides this, which the immigrant must be taught in order to become a useful and not a dangerous citizen, he needs instruction in religion. The perfunctory rites that satisfied him in Italy, Spain and Russia are useless here even as social restraints. The Bible handed to him when he lands is in most cases a new book to him. He cannot understand how it can be the basis of our civilization. Our schools and lectures which do so much to civilize him, need to be supplemented by the churches. The Russian Jew, steeped in superstition, needs to be taken in hand by his American brother and taught his own religion more perfectly. The nominal Catholic must be liberated from his dependence on the priest and led to seek light for himself. Every church and every denomination has to do its work not by proselyting, but by making religion a vital and personal thing.

way, of the need of these heathen Eskimos. Since 1820, these waters have been navigated by whalers from Dundee, Scotland, and elsewhere, up to the present time. The Eskimos living in these regions have been supplied with guns, ammunition and other absolute necessities by the whalers; but the whale fishery has been a failure of late, so much so that the whalers are seriously thinking of giving it up.

"As far as the whalers are concerned it is only natural that they should abandon these unprofitable waters; but the Eskimos who have hitherto traded with them and received supplies, are now to be abandoned also, and they will feel this change very keenly. We fear it will mean starvation to many, as they cannot now secure a living in the way their forefathers did with primitive hunting implements.

"This is their great bodily need; but what shall we say of their spiritual need? Here are 2,000 Eskimos without Christ and his Gospel, left to themselves in heathen darkness and superstition.

"Should the means be forthcoming, and should our Mission Board in Herrnhut, Germany, see their way clear to go further north, we propose that a suitable place be found in Baffin's Land, for we believe that many Eskimos of the surrounding islands could be reached from that point.

"It is my privilege to thank your kind readers for various contributions towards our mission work. Accept also my heartiest thanks for the sleigh you so kindly sent me. I hope to use it on my journeys next winter, and hope to send you some account of our work next year.

"CHR. SCHMITT."

Better and Better

To live better and better seems to be the aim of every American family. The effort may be laudable—it certainly is not easy. Hard as the game may be on the players, the coming of death or disaster makes it doubly strenuous. The least that a man so engrossed can do is to make sure that those with whom and for whom he is now spending all, are protected against the want and distress that would follow his death. The best way to ensure this is by means of a policy in

The Mutual Life Insurance Company

A policy in this Company has been a good thing for sixty-four years. It is to-day better than ever. The savings made and being made by the new management have no other place to go than to the policy-holders of the Company. Are you living up to the limit? A policy in the Mutual Life will give you safety and peace of mind. It will grow better and better. You will be interested when you know the latest phases of life insurance.

When My Mother Tucked Me In

NEVER quite so fond a kiss,
Never such a sweet good-night,
Never heaven so near to this
Old world, as when her bright
Brown eyes looked into mine,
And with hand that seemed divine,
My mother tucked me in.

Evening prayers of course were said,
Drowsily I must admit,
As I tumbled into bed,
Glad to have me rid of it!
Then upon the stairs her tread,
Soft and gentle in the gloom,
Spoke of love that comforted,
As her presence filled the room,
And mother tucked me in.

And in after years a man,
Went to bed at home again;
Prayed perhaps with better plan
Than he did in those days, when
He was ignorant of sin;
Then he called her to his side
And could not be satisfied
Till his mother tucked him in.

G. A. WARBURTON.

SELFISH LIVING

By Mrs. M. Baxter

EVERY man who destroys his own body by drink, by narcotics, tobacco, opium, etc., or by impurity, robs God. His spiritual nature has no life, he quenches the Spirit by his sin: his soulish life (of intellect and emotions) is perverted, his reason can no longer act, his affections are the slaves of his animal passions. And then his poor miserable body provokes the disgust and contempt of all who have not the grace of God in them to commiserate and help him.

Who is to blame for the terrible intemperance that abounds? The moderate drinker looks down from his pedestal, proud that he can control himself and keep the dangerous enemy in check; and he blames the drunkard. The law of the country sides with such, and, while providing by its numerous licenses many places of temptation for the drunkard's easy fall, yet blames him individually as soon as he is down in the mire. Some blame the brewers and distillers as the cause of the terrible curse of our so-called Christian land. Some blame intoxicating liquors themselves; but there are other and quicker poisons which yet hurt not those who do not touch them. Some blame the Government. It is a significant fact that in lands where the revenue is not obtained by the vices of the people, sensual vices do not obtain the ascendancy in the same degree.

There is no need for a man to become a drunkard if he will only flee to God to save him, and yield himself fully up to him. There is no need for a man who is a drunkard to continue so, if he will come with his temptation and his sin to a ready, waiting Saviour. If a drunkard is willing to be delivered, and at any cost, he will never find the Lord Jesus unwilling to deliver him. He who cast seven devils out of Mary Magdalene is also willing to cast out the devil of drink from any who really fly unto him for refuge. The real operating cause of the drunkard's sin is not in the Government, the saloon, or the drink itself, but in his independence of his God. When God takes his true place upon the throne of our being, there is a Power over us which is "able even to subdue all things unto himself" (Phil. 3: 21).

Some may argue that they have been changed from drunkards to sober men by sheer force of will and without the grace of God. This is quite true, but in many cases we have grieved to see that the enemy who was cast out, finding his old house empty of the presence of Jesus, "swept and garnished," has brought with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, who have entered in and dwelt there (Matt. 12: 43-45). We have seen in such the spirit of self-righteousness, which despises the blood that bought us; the spirit of greed after money; the spirit of harsh judgment and contempt of those who are now what he once was, and other kindred spirits, which make him savor more of the Pharisee than of the poor publican, and which cause him to be farther off from God than when he was a consciously lost, undone sinner. Many a drunkard, in his better moments, is kind, and even generous, to others who are in trouble, while the self-saved drunkard rarely is so.

The question for the Christian is, "Am I right to use strong drink?" For a man or woman who comes under its power the question is easily settled. "Can a man take fire into his bosom, and his clothes not be burned? Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burned?" (Prov. 6: 27, 28.) It is an awful thing, a wilful suicide, to tamper with a known foe, by yielding up the body to a power which enslaves. But there are those who have power over their own will, and still better, can trust the Lord to keep them: can it be wrong for such to use intoxicants? Let us answer by the truth which regulates the whole life of a true follower of Jesus: "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's" (I. Cor. 6: 19, 20). "Let us not, therefore, judge one another any more; but judge this rather, that no man [by his example] put a stumblingblock or an occasion to fall in his brother's way."

An Imitation Takes for its Pattern the Real Article

There was never an imitation made of an imitation. Imitators always counterfeit the genuine article. The genuine is what you ask for, because genuine articles are the advertised ones. Imitations are not advertised, but depend for their business on the ability of the dealer to sell you something claimed to be "just as good" when you ask for the genuine, because he makes more profit on the imitation. Pompeian Massage Cream

Natural Beauty

True Cleanliness

The woman on the left is not "making up" with rouge, powder or cosmetics. She is not trying to take nature's work out of nature's hands or substituting artificial for natural beauty. She is simply aiding nature in nature's own way with the natural beautifier—Pompeian Massage Cream.

Nature will give skin beauty to a woman just as she gives it to a baby if the woman will simply provide enough assistance to overcome the unnatural conditions induced by modern sedentary, indoor living and pore-clogging soaps and powders. Massage with Pompeian Massage Cream cleans out the pores, sets the blood coursing freely, flexes the muscles and softens the skin. Then rosy cheeks, a clear complexion and firm, smooth flesh follow as a matter of course.

The man on the right uses Pompeian Massage Cream after his shave to get the smarting soap and other foreign matter out of the pores, to strengthen the skin against razor rash, and to keep his face well groomed. It gives him the healthy, ruddy, athletic appearance that every man desires.

Barbers give massage with Pompeian Massage Cream by hand and with massage machines. In asking for a massage at your barber's, however, always make sure to specify that Pompeian Massage Cream must be used. There are many inefficacious, and some harmful, substitutes.

TEST IT WITH OUR FREE SAMPLE

Simply write us you want to try it, and we will send you a generous-sized sample, together with our illustrated book on Facial Massage, which is an invaluable guide for the proper care of the skin.

Pompeian Massage Cream is sold for home use in two sizes—50 cents and $1.00.

All sizes and styles of bottles bear same label and trade-mark. Under any circumstances do not accept a substitute—none of them have the properties of the genuine Pompeian, while some are positively harmful. We prefer you to buy of your dealer whenever possible. However, if he does not have Pompeian, we will send a 50-cent or $1.00 jar of cream, postpaid, on receipt of price to any part of the world.

Remarkable Popular Song Offer: We'll send postpaid, for only six cents in stamps, the present popular success of New York, "I Don't Want No Imitation Man" (a most laughable song-story of the girl who advertised for the 18-karat man, but got an imitation of the genuine brand), by Frederick Hamill, and more catchy and tuneful than any of his other successes. This song doesn't cost you 25 cents, because we bought the copyright for the benefit of our patrons. Offered for sale now for the first time. Order to-day. 6 cents in loose stamps (not stuck to the paper) to the address below.

POMPEIAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 13 Prospect Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

Pompeian Massage Soap is pure—and more. It contains the same properties as Pompeian Massage Cream. It is sold by all dealers—everywhere that Pompeian Massage Cream is sold. 25c. a cake; 60c. box of 3 cakes.

Warning to Men: Beware of the countless imitations that barbers use in place of the original and genuine Pompeian Cream. All are inferior—many are positively dangerous. A barber uses an imitation Cream because it costs him less, and is hence not a quality product. Your face deserves the purest and best. Get it—always look for the original Pompeian jar.

Questions and Answers

S. S., Water Valley, Ky. Is there any idea who wrote the last chapter of Deuteronomy, describing the death of Moses?

There is no positive knowledge, but there were probably many in the camp who were able to write it, and we cannot imagine their being willing to have so important an event go unrecorded. Joshua is the most likely to have written it; but he may have confided the duty to Eleazar, the priest. Some of the higher critics attribute the whole book to a much later date.

F. A., Dubuque, Ia. Besides the question of coal and engine supplies an enormous quantity of food will be needed to meet the wants of our battleship fleet. Can you supply any information as to how the food will be transported, and as to quantities, etc?

The naval officials will buy in the market as usual and the supplies will be distributed to the warships through the Brooklyn Navy Yard. There will be some 6,500,000 pounds of provisions, including 1,200,000 pounds flour, 61,000 corn meal, 500,000 canned fruits, 20,000 oatmeal, 25,000 cocoa, 1,000,000 beef, 100,000 mutton, 150,000 salt pork, 50,000 ham, 100,000 corned beef, 300,000 smoked meats, about 80,000 other meats, such as chipped beef, sausage, veal, pork loins, about 300,000 pounds of various kinds of beans, 800,000 pounds potatoes, besides large stores of milk, syrup, vinegar, eggs, macaroni, canned tomatoes, fruits and fish, hominy, barley, tea, coffee, sugar, baking soda, etc. We cannot give any estimate of the cost of the food supply.

J. L., Hudsonville, Mich. 1. What is your individual missionary support plan? 2. What is the cost to support a native worker in the different fields?

1. It is for a person or group of persons here at home to support a native teacher, preacher, evangelist, or Bible woman in a heathen land, as his or their personal substitute at the front and to enter into regular mail communication with the worker, and thereby keep in touch with the work and learn of its spiritual progress. 2. We have now personally-supported native workers in a number of different fields and the demand is growing. You can have a substitute in India, China or Africa at from $60 to $75 a year.

J. B., Detroit, Mich. 1. How many employees are now at work on the Panama Canal? 2. What nationalities are represented? 3. What are their working hours?

The latest official report gives the following, which answers questions 1 and 2:

Isthmian Canal Commission	American clerks, foremen, employees in Sanitary Department and all others not mechanics,	1,000
	American mechanics,	4,000
	West Indian negroes (laborers),	25,000
	Europeans, including Spaniards, Italians and Greeks	4,500
			34,500
Panama Railway	Clerks (black and white),	1,244
	Laborers (black and white),	4,384	5,628
	Total,		40,128

3. The majority of the employees work more than 8 hours, and some of the laborers, though hired for a 9-hour day, work 10, 12 and occasionally 14 hours. The railroad employees also have a long day, averaging from 10 to 12 hours.

Apropos of a recent article in these pages by Kate Upson Clarke, a reader, R. D., Rome, Ga., writes:

The exigencies of the Civil War took me from my home in Montgomery, Ala., to Richmond, Va. In the same office was a good old Methodist brother, who invited me to attend his church. Though of another denomination, I went. The cordial greeting extended completely overpowered me, and I was never in a happier frame of mind in my life. I resolved I would go and do likewise, and to this day I continue to invite strangers to church. This old brother has long passed to his reward, but his influence still lives. After the war, business took me to Boston once or twice each year. The first Sunday I attended church, one of the members met me at the door and gave me a most cordial greeting and handshake, and one of the best seats in the house. Though the war was just over and my heart had been one of the bitterest, this act of kindness took it all away, and I felt I was in the house of friends and among brethren. Forty years have elapsed, but I still feel kind towards the Boston people. I am satisfied that no inducement greater than acts of kindness such as I have cited can be offered to persuade people to attend church.

Ability to read music (i. e., sing at sight) is assured, if you follow the instructions, which are quite simple, and study the lessons conscientiously. Write to Musical Editor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York, for full information.

J. F. P., Ludlow, Vt. 1. What is meant by the "great year" of 600 years, spoken of by Josephus in his Antiquities? 2. Can you give me the Esperanto publisher's name and address in Boston, Mass?

1. As Josephus explains, it is a term used to designate an astronomical cycle, and has no special relation to man's longevity. 2. Revell & Co., New York, and Harpers, New York, both publish Esperanto text-books.

In THE MAIL-BAG of November 6, the problem of the tramp, the merchant, the postmaster and the pair of shoes was answered, but several of our readers have now sent what appears to be the right solution. Mrs. T. T. Fishburne, of Roanoke, Va. (whose letter is dated November 4), writes:

The merchant took the counterfeit $10 to the postmaster, for which he received ten good dollars. He paid the tramp $6 and delivered him the shoes, and of course kept $4 of the money himself. When the postmaster demanded that he redeem the $10 counterfeit, he only had to take $6 of his own money and the $4 remaining of what the postmaster had given him, to return to the postmaster, so the merchant was only out $6 and the shoes, instead of $16 and the shoes.

Other correct solutions came from E. R. Reed, Madison, Wis.; R. J. Aiton, Greensboro, N. C.; A. C. Wentworth, Lowell, Mass.; W. H. C. Dudley, Americus, Ga.; J. J. God said, "Nay, walk in the town."
I said, "There are no flowers there."
He said, "No flowers, but a crown."
I said, "But the fogs are thick,
And clouds are veiling the sun."
He answered, "But hearts are sick,
And souls in the dark undone."
I said, "But the skies are black;
There is nothing but noise and din."
And he wept as he led me back.
"There is more," he said; "there is sin."
I said, "I shall miss the light,
And friends will miss me, they say."
He answered, "Choose ye to-night
If I must miss you or they."
I pleaded for time to be given.
He said, "Is it hard to decide?
It will not seem hard in heaven
To follow the steps of your Guide."

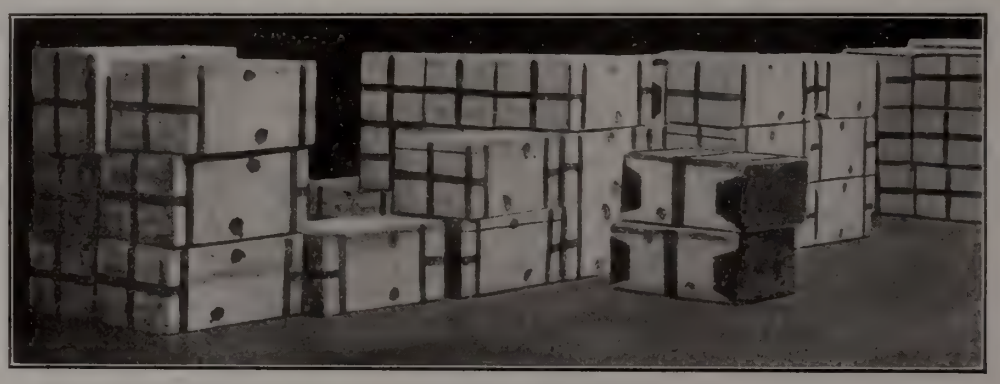
H. M. H., Vinnie, Miss. Is the wireless telephone a reality and of proven value?

Yes; the wireless telephone exists, but is not yet of practical value, though there is every prospect of its being so at an early date. It was reported recently that the crews of two ships twenty miles apart had telephoned through water, and experiments have shown that the human voice can be carried some distance through the air from sender to receiver. Of course no sound is heard between the two points.



Fifteen Tons of Gold (Value $7,100,000) Brought from Europe for New York Banks

GOLD BULLION is now flowing from Europe to this country in a steady stream, being imported to meet the needs of the New York banks and banking institutions in other cities during the present money stringency. Our photograph shows the first large consignment brought over on the steamship Kronprinzessin Cecilie, $7,100,000 packed in 235 boxes. These boxes were taken first to the bankers' offices and thence to the Sub-Treasury and the Assay Office, the money being required for immediate circulation. The gold (some of which was in coin, but the larger part in bars) was encased in sacks, which were closely packed in the stout boxes. After being weighed, ninety per cent. of its value in American gold minted coin was paid to the owners, the balance being reserved until the metal was assayed. A still larger consignment, aggregating $10,000,000, is on the steamship Lusitania, and other big shipments of gold are coming. It is estimated that not less than $40,000,000 in European gold has been engaged to relieve the financial stringency here. The general situation among the banks is steadily improving.

Music in Churches and Schools

Any church, private school or academy desiring the services of an experienced lady organist, can be put in communication with one who is a thorough musician, on writing to "Organist," care of this journal. This lady has played the organ in Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches in several States, and besides being familiar with all branches of church music, has trained choirs and soloists, is an expert accompanist in studio work, concert or recital, a superior piano teacher, and has a practical knowledge of oratorio and opera-ensemble music. The quality of her work and her high recommendations should assure her consideration from schools and churches wishing to improve the character of their musical services.

Market Day in a Provincial Austrian Town

QUAINT NOOKS OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY

EMPEROR FRANZ JOSEF'S serious illness and the talk of a new ruler is drawing attention, once again, to an empire which is probably possessed of more queer corners and quaint crannies than any other on the face of the globe.

Austria-Hungary, in fact, is such a collection of picturesque towns and races that one scarce knows where to begin in detailing the unique points of interest. Probably the most picturesque of all is Spalatro, the city built in a palace, down on the east coast of the Adriatic.

Coming up to Spalatro by sea, practically the only means of reaching it, the traveler sees first a wide, open country, then a background of the blue hills. Suddenly up from the coast rise the remains of an old Roman palace, high, massive and timeworn, but with modern curtains and shades, and very modern panes of glass in the windows.

Alighting at the wharf, one passes through what was once the imperial gateway, to find himself inside a huge enclosing wall, three or more stories in height, and composed, on this inner side, for the most part, of buildings that cling like barnacles to the older structure.

As a matter of fact, the entire interior space of the old palace is crowded with buildings of one form or another, and even the old bridges, thrown across the narrow lanes, now serve for roomers like garret chambers in a tenement. There is no one spot in all the world just like this. What heightens the interest is the number of Venetian remains that still exist in the castle. One of these, an old street clock, not alone tolls out the hour, but repeats it ten minutes afterward, to make sure that all have heard.

Children of Dalmatia

The story of Spalatro is brief but interesting. When the great Roman emperor Diocletian became tired of ruling the world, he betook himself to Dalmatia—Illyria it was then—and built the palace. After his death the place was gradually deserted, until, at last, not a soul remained. Then Venetian adventurers, fugitives from justice and the like, found it a convenient place to stop when their high-decked caravels came across the Adriatic. Gradually the town grew up and developed into a thriving city.

A Castle in Croatia

This eastern coast has many other interesting corners. In Trieste the out-door cafes have interest for the traveler on account of their novel customs. For example, at breakfast, coffee and a tray of crescent rolls are brought. One is hungry and helps himself liberally to the latter. When the time for reckoning comes, the waiter asks how many have been eaten. To test him, one says one or two less than is the case. At once he begs pardon for correcting you, but "you are in error." The reason for this custom is unknown. They always know just how many broedchen are in a basket; always correct you if you mistake, and yet always leave it to you to tell how many you have taken.

Inland, some distance from Trieste, on an inlet of the sea, the government salt works at Capo d'Istria are an interesting spectacle. Miles of deep blue salt lagoons lie here, and at their sides picturesque wind mills draw the water from trench to trench.

The mills have four sails set into a frame resembling a Newfoundland hay mow. The people of the salt lagoons are a race of basket-weavers, something like the people Herodotus described. On the boats for Trieste, they do not sit down on the benches, but flop into the huge baskets, which they carry. In their homes, their chairs are the upturned baskets. On the Emperor's highway, one meets their donkeys with the panniers. In these panniers they carry everything, clothing, food, articles of sale, etc. The women ride on the baskets.

This portion of Austria, too, has a strange parallel to a noted oddity of our own country. Every tourist to the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky has remarked the Christmas tree placed there some years since, when the owners of the cavern entertained some of the Kentucky school children, and on which from that day tourists have hung their visiting cards. Away up at St. Kanzian, in Istria, there are a series of caves, and in one of these a Christmas tree has been set up for the local children, serving a like end.

An American Colonial

Passing from Istria, on down the coast into Lower Austria, the tourist finds in the Dalmatian Archipelago one of the beauty spots of the world. Opinions differ, but those of us who have seen the two are quite apt to prefer Dalmatia's island chain to the Thousand Islands of the St. Lawrence.

These islands, large and small, hug the shore. Centuries since, the Romans began to cut the trees; later the

Unrecognized Blessings

TEXT—Job 6: 5

"Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder?"

SOME people have a false reputation for being good-natured that they may easily lose. No man can be confidently pronounced good-natured until he has been tested by adversity. No credit is due to a prosperous man for not complaining; if when he is poor and unfortunate and sick he does not complain, then he has given proof of the strength and sweetness of his character. His true nature is shown not when he is basking in the sunshine, but when he is deluged by the storm. It is really revealed, not when conditions are going the way he wishes, but when all his desires seem to be thwarted and he is compelled to do what he does not wish to do. He is not tempted to grumble when he is prosperous. "Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder?"

A Discontented Passenger

There is a quaint legend told by Dr. Knight that many years ago an Eastern king was sailing in a ship with a Persian peasant. The peasant began to bitterly complain of being shut up in the narrow confines of the boat. These complaints irritated the king. Then a philosopher, who was traveling in the same boat, said: "I can silence yonder grumbler if thou wilt let me." The king gave his consent. The philosopher ordered the sailors to throw the peasant into the sea. After the man had gone down a couple of times the sailors caught him by the hair and pulled him back into the boat safely. Then were all his bitter complaints silenced. The king asked the philosopher why this was so. The sage replied: "At first yonder man had never thought of the danger of being drowned, neither did he appreciate the safety of the ship. As soon as he found out by bitter experience the value of this ship as a refuge from something worse, he was contented to stay therein until he could reach the shore. In like manner, he best knoweth the value of prosperity who hath encountered adversity. Oh thou, who hast satisfied thine hunger, thou despisest a barley loaf; but to me, a-hungered, a barley loaf means life. To the nymphs of Paradise, purgatory would be hell; but the inhabitants of hell would hail purgatory as Paradise." In other words, the Eastern philosopher was teaching the lesson that when a man's every wish is satisfied, then he does not complain; he complains about what he has not, but not of what he has. Does the wild ass find fault because he is wading knee-deep in a field of sweet-scented clover? Does the ox in anger batter his stall into kindling-wood when, after a hard day's toil, he is allowed to munch his grain at a manger filled to overflowing?

The book of Job illustrates this truth. There were three distinct epochs in Job's career. The first was when every desire of his heart was satisfied. Great was he in brain, great in financial resources, great in domestic happiness. His pasture land extended on every side. His sheep and cattle and horses grazed upon a thousand hills. His harvest fields, like the surface of the sea, stretched away as far as the eye could see. Old age mellowed him, but did not deplete his physical strength. His children were his pride and joy. His friends were around him everywhere. Even his enemies were disarmed by his love and generosity. He never omitted to thank God for his blessings in the morning and at noon and at night. For everything that his heart desired was given unto him.

Job's Experience

But suddenly the wheel of fortune turns. Crash goes his son's home and in an hour all his beloved children are dead. Down swoop the robbers, and his herds are scattered and driven away and his servants put to the sword. Then all over his body break forth the horrible carbuncles. His health, as well as his wealth and domestic happiness, is gone. Though he does not sin "nor charge God foolishly," he does curse the day of his birth.

No sooner does he do this than his three friends gather about him and remind him of his past profession. They commence to fling his former avowals of faith at him. "Aha," they cry. "You are a pretty servant of God! When things were all going your way you were very willing to tell people what they should do. But when things go wrong with you you lose your faith in God just like other men." "I know it," answers Job. "Alas for the weakness of the flesh. God help me. Alas, I was like the ass standing knee-deep in sweet-scented clover. I was like the ox munching at the abundant grain in his manger. O God, help me in this time of trouble."

Now, in applying this principle to ourselves, I am not going to catalogue your misfortunes. You can easily do that yourself. You have complained about them enough. You have harped upon them day in and day out. But I am going to speak about your "silences." I would remind you of the blessings you have in life. Perhaps the thought of these blessings, about which you are apt to be silent, may strengthen your heart to bear adversity, should it come upon you.

In the first place, I have never heard you complain about your father and mother. They must certainly have been a great blessing to you. If they had not been, you would certainly have talked disparagingly of them. And this is a very marvelous fact to me, because they were not very wonderful people from a human standpoint. I do not think your father had much of an education. Then he certainly was not wealthy. He lived on a farm most of his life. And your mother was not a very beautiful woman. I saw her picture in your home the other day. She had just a plain, good, motherly face. She was just the kind of a woman we would have supposed your father would have married. She would not have shone as the queen of a ballroom. She was the queen of the needle and the best cook you have ever known. Your father spent most of his time in the fields; she spent most of her time in the kitchen and the nursery. And yet you honor your mother just as much as though she had been the most beautiful woman that ever lived, and as if her fingers had been lustrous with diamonds. And you pronounce your father's name with as much reverence as though his wisdom had governed a nation, instead of being devoted to making a straight furrow with a plow. Why is all this? Why do you not find fault with the cradle in which you were rocked? Surely, there must have been something very marvelous about your parents' lives, for you not to complain about them.

A Father's Testimony

"Well," you answer, "the reason I love the dear faces of my father and mother so much, is because they were so good. Why, I am no child. I am nearly fifty years of age. I have been thrown with all classes of people. I have lived in the homes of the rich as well as of the poor. And after nearly half a century's experience, I can truly say that I have never met a man nor a woman who was more truly trying to live the Christ life than were my old father and mother. Why, their faith was so simple and true that it was divine. I remember well the time when financial troubles threatened to make us sell the farm. Father had worked very hard that year; but just before harvest time, there came an awful cyclone and battered down the grain. Then it was an off-year for fruit. Then mother, while nursing one of the neighbors, was taken down with fever. To cap the climax, father had an ugly horse, and one day it kicked him and broke his leg. There we were, a lot of little helpless children, with both parents sick. I can remember as though it was yesterday, when father called me into the room. He said, 'Harry, my boy, I am afraid you must give up your school for a while. I do not know how God will lead us out from this difficulty. But he can and he will. He has never failed me yet, and he will not fail me now.'" Then you look at me in a peculiar way as you say, "And God never did desert him. He never did! Oh, my father and mother were so good. They were so truly good!"

I am glad to hear you say that, my brother. It means more than gold and silver. It means more than fame or social prestige. I would sooner have a father and mother such as you had, than to have any other inheritance. The heritage of your cradle is to-day teeming with manifold blessings. No wonder you do not complain of your parents. Why, by every word they uttered, by every act they did, they were leading you to the higher life, and their influence is potent yet. When you think of your parents and think of the blessings of your old homestead you are content and grateful. There is nothing left in that respect for you to desire. "Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder?"

Mental Equipment

But there is another momentous fact in the record of your life that impresses me marvelously. I have never heard you complain because you did not have brain enough, or opportunity enough to earn the daily bread for yourself and your family. Now, I have often heard some of you complain because you could not dress as well as some one else. I have heard you complain because you could not live in a grand home, own a summer cottage and run an automobile. But I have never heard you complain that you did not have enough food to eat, and enough clothing to keep you warm, and a weathertight roof to cover your head. Not once have you been in such straits that you had not a five cent piece to buy a loaf of bread. Not once has your wardrobe been so empty that you did not have an extra coat hanging there to keep out the cold. As far as I can make out, God has fed and clothed you and housed you for fifty years. Having done this, has he not a right to ask you to trust him to the end? With such a past, and with such a God to care for your future, are you not content? Why should you complain? "Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder?"

Parental Responsibility

But there is still another fact which impresses me about your life. You never complain about your wife and children. Though there are scores and hundreds, and I sometimes fear even thousands, of unhappy homes in this city, yours is not one of these. You are like the patriarch Job in his earlier and later days. You think you have about the finest wife, the best sons, the prettiest and smartest daughters in all this land. And the trouble is that your children know how highly you think of them. Why, they can get anything out of you they desire. Your wife has some common sense as to raising the children, but you have absolutely none. But though you may be so fond of your children that you allow them to get anything out of you, are you doing all you can for their best interests? Your children love you so much that you can lead them to enter the Christian life. Now, in your great love for your home and family you have every incentive to be faithful to your God. As a parental under-shepherd, are you going to prove recreant to your trust?

There is a sad story told that near the burning ghats of Benares, some years ago, an Indian missionary was walking. There he saw a poor Hindu mother weeping by the ashes where, a couple of days before, the body of her child had been burned. But in the night, a hideous serpent had crawled in among the ashes to sleep. While the woman was weeping, the serpent began to uncoil itself. Then, the heathen's superstitious belief in the transmigration of souls passing through her mind, the horror-stricken mother flung herself at the feet of the white man, crying, "O God, has my little baby come to that?" Of course, that was only the result of her pagan teaching. But tell me, father and mother, have you no fear that such a horror may one day be yours, if you fail to lead your children to Christ? They seem to you pure and good now; but if they go out into the world without the protection that Christ alone can give, you may be startled and agonized at seeing the serpents of sin and vice rear their heads out of the breasts of those loved ones. You can now mould them as you will, but the time is short, and unless you make the most of it they will pass from under your influence unprotected by Christ's love. Now, while the opportunity is yours, by your example and your teachings, do your utmost to place them under Christ's protecting care.

The Church Home

But there is another matter of which I have never heard you complain. It is your religious privileges. I have never heard you complain because you had no Sunday School to which you could send your little children; no prayer-meeting in which you could assemble with God's disciples to pray; no church altar at which, on the Sabbath day, you could kneel and worship. Thousands upon thousands to-day are living so far away from church that it is an impossibility for them to go there on the Sabbath day. But this is not the case with you. Here you are, living practically under the shadow of the walls of our church. Here is a place in the family pew always waiting you. Here are good men and women ready and willing to pray with you. Whenever you come within these walls, a spirit of love and consecration creeps over you such as you find in no other place on earth.

Oh, how sorry I feel for the man or the woman who has no church home! I feel almost as sorry as for the man who has no domestic fireside and who, instead of eating at his own family table, is compelled to eat at boarding-houses and in restaurants. Home, home, home! It is the sweetest word in all the English language. Home, home, home! It means the laughter of children and the frolic in the nursery. Home, home, Venetians completed the work by taking from here the masts for their galleys. Wind and storm then washed the soil, until with the march of the centuries every trace of vegetation has been swept away. The native rock of the islands is spotless white, and this fades to blue in the distance. With the blue sea and the dark-blue skies, the beauty of the prospect is unrivaled. On some of the larger islands, towns have sprung up. In each of these towns, the costume has been unchanged since remote times. One can tell at once whence a man or a woman hails, by some difference in the dress.

Continuing on to the south, Pola is reached. Pola is the naval base of Austria-Hungary. Within the city limits there rises a remarkable Roman amphitheatre, really more impressive than the Coliseum in Rome. It is 142 metres across in one direction, 170 in the other.

Nor is it in things historical alone that Austria-Hungary is of interest. Nature, too, has given it curiosities. There is no place in all the world like the Vale of Kazanlyk for raising the rose that produces the famous attar. If the same plants be sent into the next valley, they will lose their aroma. Up here at Zara, the maraschino cherry takes from the soil a peculiar taste that you do not get anywhere else.

One thing characterizes the dual empire more than another, and that is its hodge-podge of nationalities, Croats and Germans, Tyrolese and Italians, Saxons, Poles, Czechs, Albanians, Magyars, Bohemians, Moravians and Dalmatians—each with its language, its customs, its own particular national ambition.

Probably most interesting of them all are the Albanians, of the same race as the Albanians of the Ottoman Empire. The real Albanian of Islam is, to begin with, a creature standing full six feet tall. He is stalwart and strong, for when a babe is born who, it is feared, might prove a weakling, it is exposed on the mountain tops to die. In Austria, the Albanians, however, have come under civilizing influences, and as one sees them in Grizzio, they are a primitive but reasonably moral lot. Households are large. In their little stone cabins, married sons, with their wives and children, live with the parents until the death of the old folks.

One of the cities of Austria has the distinction of containing the smallest hat in Europe, if not in the world—this place, Sebenico. The Sebenican wears just a little red flannel disk, not larger than an American dollar and lined with blue paper muslin. The thing has to be kept on the head with an elastic, and its purpose, save as an ornament, is difficult to guess.

North central Austria-Hungary, too, has its places of interest. Fiume, the sea-port of Hungary, for instance, is one of the few remaining old royal free cities. Instead of being governed by the crown land in which it lies, it is independent save to the king direct.

At Agram one finds what is without a doubt the world's most beautiful market. Sunday morning is market day, and the peasants come from afar in their carts. These peasants, men and women both, are dressed in white, ornamented by the most delicate embroidery. The picture presented by these folk, as they hover over the stalls of fruit and the great crocks of dairy and farm produce, is a most picturesque one.

In contrast to the whiteness of the Agram market are the duller browns of gipsy-land. In Sissek and Somobor, one sees the gipsies at their best. Not the musical gipsies; for those one must go on to Buda-Pest, where on summer evenings they play in the cafes. The sweet, soft cadences of gipsy-land, however, are passing even here, for, instead, the gipsies now dispense only our American rag-time.

When one gets among the Austrian peasantry, he find them very superstitious, and one city at least, Ragusa, has a very substantial memento as a result of this. As the story goes, years ago a poor skipper of the place left to sail on a long and dangerous voyage to trade in distant lands. He put all of his money in the venture, but the ship was caught in a storm and went down, the sailor barely saving his own life. He came back to his native city again, and borrowed from friends and relatives enough to buy and fit out a new ship and he went out once more. Again he was overtaken by a storm, and after a long struggle with wind and wave, the second ship followed the other to the bottom. Clinging to a spar, the sailor was cast up on shore. Ruined and deserted, the sailor betook himself to a lonely part of Gravosa to meditate—perhaps on suicide. As he sat there, gazing into space, a golden coupon for one [illegible] tried to coax its way [illegible] Once it tried, and failed. A second [illegible] A third time, and [illegible] desired spot. Superstitious, as all sailors are, the man saw in the act a parallel to his own fate, and with the story went before the council of the town to beg assistance, vowing, if he should succeed, to leave a rich legacy for their reward.

The council was at first incredulous, but moved by the story, the man was fitted out with ship and crew. The time success crowned the voyage, and on his return he bequeathed to the place a sum whereby every poor girl of Ragusa receives a dowry sufficient to wed the man of her choice, for here love counts for naught, if the girl's dowry is not what it should be to furnish the new home.

The provincial nobility of Hungary, Croatia and Dalmatia are a most picturesque body of men when at home. The national costume of the Hungarians is worn by the Hungarian nobility on all gala occasions, and of these there are many in the course of the year. They wear a cap made of costly fur and the plume is attached with a heavy gold and diamond brooch. Their coats are of velvet or satin, heavily braided, and decorated with any badges or orders of knighthood the wearer may be fortunate enough to possess. The trousers are tight-fitting and of a dark color. These also are heavily braided, a strip down the side and an ornamental pattern on front. Short, brightly polished boots are worn, with a line of gold or silver braid around the top and a tassel on the peak in front. Over one shoulder is thrown a heavy velvet cape, green or red in color, lined and edged with costly fur. It has much embroidery and braid in front.

The long avenues of golden poplars leading to ancient castles in which these picturesque nobles live in Croatia are now having their timber sold to the gipsies, who fell the trees to work up into boards.

From Agram one can continue south into Bosnia and the Herzegovina. Thirty odd years ago these were the turbulent provinces; human life was unsafe in them all. To-day it is as safe in Bosnia as it is in New York. One is tempted to say considerably safer. Bosnia is now a model province. Austria-Hungary is supposed to have taken it over only as an indefinite loan, to be put in order and policed. To-day, however, she has practically annexed it, and not a cent of tithe or tax goes to the Sultan, who remains still as shadowy master.

ome! It sometimes means a very humble roof and ery plain fare upon the table. Home, home, home! t may mean struggle and poverty and sickness and eath. But home means love—home means a tender lace—home means human hearts clinging to us as we ling to them. So in the household of faith, called the hurch. We may not seem to the outside world to mount to much, but we are one family gathered in iod's temple, which is our spiritual home. Here we re living for each other. Here we are praying for ach other. And here, as in no other place, we feel he spiritual magnetic touch of our fellow men. My riends, as a church we ought to try to live more for iod. For the sake of the love we bear each other, e should try to do it. Are we not as the wild ass, nee deep in the field of sweet-scented clover? Are we ot as the ox before the manger filled to overflowing ith richest grain?

But there is another fact that I have never heard ou complain about, and that is your opportunity for oing good in the great outside world in which you ve. I have never heard you say that there were no eople in trouble near your home. As I was writing is sermon, I looked down from my study into the reet and saw a couple of young ladies walking past. hey were dressed from head to foot in black. They ad sweet faces. But I was not looking at them so uch as looking beyond. I said to myself: "I wonder ho has lately gone out of that family circle? Was a father or a mother? Was it a brother whom those sisters were helping to educate at college? God pity them." And as I spake thus, I thought of how many aching hearts there were about me, bleeding from the gash of the grave-digger's spade.

Then the poor and the sick! Oh, how many there are! And the young people being led forth into a life of sin. You see them all around you. Then the old folks—how they would love to have us come and visit them and read to them. Yes, the opportunities are all about us for doing good. You have only to stretch forth your hands to touch them. Are we so happy, so contented, so selfish that we help not one about us? Charles Darwin, the great physicist, tells us that there is a degeneracy which often follows great prosperity. Many years ago, quite a number of bee-swarms were carried to the Island of Barbadoes in the West Indies. At first they went diligently to work to gather honey to prepare for the coming winters. But when those bees found that they were in a land of perpetual summer, they ceased to gather honey. Instead, they spent most of their time flying around, stinging the natives. So I sometimes think it is with some of us. We have what can be called spiritual degeneracy. God has surrounded us with so many blessings that, instead of working for his glory and for the good of our fellow men, we spend most of our time in living for self. We thrust the sting when we should be gathering the sweetness of the Gospel life to give out again to starving men. Are we not standing knee-deep amid the clover tops of multitudinous opportunities, which we can use for the good of those who have never learned to honor the name of our Christ?

But lastly, I remark that I have never heard you complain that God is not willing to place the hands of ordination and consecration upon your head now, for the glorious work of the Gospel, if you are only willing to surrender your hearts to him. I care not what your past has been. I care not whether you have sinned seventy times seven! Though your sins are as scarlet, yet, if you will come to him, they will become whiter than snow. Though they are like crimson, yet they shall become white as wool. O my brother, with so many of your Gospel opportunities wasted, will you not make your last days your best days? Will you not pray that the eventide of your life may shine with the golden sunset of God's smile of benediction?

To-day I have been telling about your chances. For years you have been complaining that you could not do this, that and the other thing. To-day I have been telling you a few things that you could do, if you only wanted to do them. The mercies of God alone [illegible] are infinite. The great folds of the [illegible] clover-tops of his love are spread out before you. The Bethlehem manger is filled to overflowing with the divine sacrifice. O hungry, starving sinner, will you not come to the cross to-day and eat your fill? "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat. Yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price."

EIGHTEEN MISSIONARIES SAIL

"DARKEST" Africa will soon lose its sombre designation if there are sent many more such enthusiastic missionary recruits as sailed recently from New York on the steamship Friedrich der Grosse. There were eighteen consecrated young men and women in the party, most of them former students of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. Eight of the number were graduates, while others had taken a partial course to prepare them for the work with the African Inland Mission.

Rev. Lee H. Downey and his wife were in charge of the party. They are experienced missionaries, having spent six years in the field in British East Africa. They sailed direct to Naples, Italy, where they will remain for four days. There they will be joined by another volunteer, Miss Nasher, who will come from her home in Sweden. She received her preliminary training in London. At Naples they will embark on the Burgomeister of the German East Africa line, which will take them to Mombasa, where they expect to arrive about December 4. Taking the Uganda Railroad they will travel three hundred and seventy miles up into the interior. It will take about twenty-four hours for this part of the journey. The new missionaries will make their home for a few months at Kyabe, the central station. It is exactly one-half a degree south of the equator. In about six months the new missionaries will have picked up enough of the language to begin active work at the mission, and in a year will be able to preach and converse without difficulty.

Missionaries at New York About to Sail for the African Field

Their work will be among three tribes. The largest of these is the Akamba, which numbers 175,000; the Agikoya have nearly as many, and the Masai have 7,000. The stations are in a good climate, none of them being below four thousand feet above sea-level.

The evening before the party sailed there was an inspiring service in the Church of the Strangers in New York. Several of the missionaries spoke and the leader of the party outlined their plans. There were but few in the large audience that did not catch the spark of missionary zeal for the unsaved, although unable to work in the foreign field.

The scene at the dock just before the Atlantic liner sailed was one that will not soon be forgotten by those who were present. The faces of the new missionary recruits were filled with happiness. They looked forward evidently with confidence and pleasure to the hard work before them. The gloom that usually accompanies such leave-takings was noticeably absent.

The roll of the party, in addition to the leaders, follows: Mr. and Mrs. Arthur F. Wachter, of Detroit, with their little girl, Ruth; Jessie E. Raynor, of Chicago; Lawson E. Propst, of North Carolina; Amos Ayer, Miss Julia Ayer and Miss Annie E. Zimmerman, of Flanagan, Ill.; Caleb C. Drescoll, Jr., of New York City; Albert E. Barnett, of Australia; William Weight, of Scotland; Miss Carrie L. Schoenheit, of Detroit; Miss Clara W. Cook, of Detroit; Miss Laura N. Collins, of Hittick, Ill.; Mrs. Jane E. Myers and daughter, Clo A. Myers, of Indiana, Pa., and Miss Clara Stumpf, of Indiana, Pa.

The African Inland Mission, under whose auspices the missionaries will work, is interdenominational. At present it has thirty-seven missionaries at work in nine different stations. It aims to found a chain of stations over a distance of 1,000 miles from British East Africa to the River Nile. The stations will be on a range of hills running northwest. The hills are from 4,000 to 7,000 feet high, and have proved healthful for white men. There are eight tribes that could be reached if the money so badly needed to equip the new outposts were forthcoming.

HELPING THE "MISSION BOAT"

GREATLY encouraged by the interest shown in their appeal for a mission boat for work in the Philippines, Rev. Frederick Jansen and Mrs. Jansen are now looking forward hopefully to an early return to their "parish of a hundred islands." It is hoped that sufficient contributions may soon be received to enable them to purchase a suitable boat, which could be sent to their mission station at Cebu, in the Philippines, to be in readiness for active service on their arrival.

Few phases of foreign missionary work have attracted more cordial and sympathetic support than this, as the letters from our readers sufficiently show. Below are a few extracts:

Miss J. L., Watsontown, Pa., in sending $5, writes: "I long for the Gospel to be sent to those who are waiting and begging for it. I cannot go myself, but I can help those who are working and suffering privations."

CHRISTIAN HERALD Reader, Commerce, Mich. ($1), writes: "We have just lost $800 by fire, but I cannot help giving a little" (toward the Mission Boat). Ida P., Ellentown, Fla., another contributor, hopes that Mr. and Mrs. Jansen may be enabled to procure a large and comfortable mission boat. Miss E. C. K., New Lebanon, N. Y., also sends a gift in aid of the Mission Boat.

These are only a few of the letters that are now reaching THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from readers and their friends in all parts of the country, who have been deeply touched by the appeal of Mr. and Mrs. Jansen for a suitable boat to enable them to do their work in their missionary parish of a hundred islands. We trust that the response to their appeal may be both prompt and liberal. All contributions for the Mission Boat, however small, will be welcomed and will find acknowledgment in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

S. M., Matteawan, N. Y. ($2), writes: "The Gospel has done so much for me that I would like the whole world to have it. So please accept this little mite. May God bless it a hundredfold."

Mrs. H. H., Los Angeles, Cal., ($2) writes: "I am much interested in the account in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the work among the Filipinos. I want to have a share in building that boat."

Friend, Middletown, Pa., ($1) writes: "Toward purchasing the Mission Boat to enable the workers to carry the message of love and salvation to the natives of Cebu and surrounding islands. May the Lord's blessing rest upon all who are seeking to have the Gospel proclaimed in all lands."

"I hope many others will appreciate the opportunity of helping in such a worthy cause," writes J. C., Sr., Oxford, O. ($3).

"May the required amount soon be realized and grand results accomplished," is the prayer of May R., Middletown, N. Y. ($2).

"I wish to help a little toward the Mission Boat to carry the glad tidings to those in darkness. Oh that they may see Jesus," writes C. M. W., East Northfield, Mass. ($1).

Miss Mabel Crawford, a missionary at Manila, writes of encouraging advancement in all lines of educational and religious life. The opening of the new school year finds nearly two hundred native teachers on the insular payroll and taking the place formerly held by Americans, who have returned to the United States. Christian teachers are exerting a great influence for good, and are held in high respect.

In Miss Crawford's Training School, there are at present twenty Filipino girls. A new rule of the training school is that they must have at least one year in the schools. The people think the girls are very wise, if they know about the Bible. The natives are anxious to learn and they become earnest students of the Word.

A Bible Class of Filipino Women, Manila

The Harris Memorial Training School is full and has had to turn away many pupils for lack of room and teachers. Sixty dollars supports a girl in the Bible Training School a year, and $75 pays the salary of one at work as a Bible reader and Gospel preacher in the provinces.

Miss Crawford is enthusiastic over the missionary problems around her, and is preparing to open work at Lingayen.

The Bible Class is one of the most popular in the Harris Memorial Deaconess Training School. The hour is prepared for carefully by the teachers and enjoyed greatly by the native girls. The latter are, as a rule, very bright and studious. They love to hear of Jesus, and are delighted when they personally own a Tagalog and an English Bible. They make happy Christian workers.

Manuela, one of these girls, is a convert. She was a poor girl and was sweeping the floor when a new student called on her for help. She dropped her cleaning cloth and sat on a chair beside the strange girl to testify for Jesus. As the teacher approached them, Manuela looked up with a happy face, and said, "I am telling her about the life of Jesus." And she did it with all her might, for she had a new, sweet and gracious message in her heart.

A Notable Gospel Work for Sailors

The Seamen's Christian Association, 399 West Street, New York, is now in its twentieth year of effort, and reports wonderful growth in all its departments. The statistics for the last month are very encouraging. During that time the aggregate attendance of seamen was 6,838; Gospel meetings held, 1,923; letters written, 1,398. The shipping bureau and banking system, of which this association was the pioneer, shows gratifying results in its efforts. More room, more money, more helpers, more earnest prayers are needed in thisunique work for seafaring men.

GENERAL BOOTH IN NEW YORK

VERY gratifying to the aged servant of Christ must have been the tribute paid to him at the New Amsterdam Theatre, in New York, on Sunday, November 3. Audiences that filled every part of the great building assembled at every one of the three services, and the number of people who were unable to gain admittance would have filled a still larger building. The throngs were not by any means confined to the classes the Salvation Army is supposed to reach. Many fashionably dressed persons, and some well known in New York's most exclusive circles, were observed side by side with men and women who take their places in the bread-line at the Bowery Mission and know by painful experience how poor a substitute for a comfortable bed is a bench in the park. Evidently it was not curiosity alone that drew this strangely assorted crowd to hear General William Booth. The tense expression on their faces showed that they were there to learn what he could tell them of a haven where the anxieties associated with suspended banks, and the hardships of poverty and the pain of hunger are unknown. There are many erudite and eloquent preachers in New York, but they came to listen to this man, because they felt that he was a man who heartily believed the thing he preached, who was thoroughly sure of the verities of the Gospel, and who had a deep sympathy with the poor and the unhappy. It must have gladdened the heart of the venerable apostle to see that his long life of self-denial and consecrated labor had been appreciated, and that men and women of all ranks and classes were hungering for the message which he delights to proclaim.

The Great Reception to General Booth in New York, November 3

No one expected to hear anything new. General Booth has led too busy a life to have delved into the mysteries of theology or to have made himself familiar with the fine-spun theories of the higher critics, or to have grasped the New Thought, or to have learned the things that come to men who "enter into the silence"; he had only the old Gospel to preach, which has been preached for eighteen centuries, and has been heard by more than fifty generations. But men came to hear him as they thronged to hear Wesley and Whitefield and Spurgeon and Moody, who had the same message and delivered it with the same simplicity. He had little to say about doctrine or about the philosophy of the plan of salvation. He assumed, as a preacher to such an audience has the right to do, that his hearers understood the fundamental principles of the Gospel. His appeal was to the will; his aim to induce men to cease striving to get happiness or peace outside of religion, to "quit unsatisfactory, unsatisfying, hollow shams, and to be satisfied with nothing short of reality in religion." He said:

> There is a religion which is satisfying. I will call your atten-

In all forms of his address General Booth was insistent on the personal element in religion. He warned his hearers against the dilettante interest which takes up religion as an interesting study with no practical purpose. The only way in which religion can serve a man, he said, was when the man gets upon what he learns. It is not enough to know that salvation is offered without money and without price; the man must accept the offer for himself. Mere resolution is not enough; there are many who, under the influence of a sermon, resolve to change their lives, but it soon wears off and results in nothing. The only safe course is to go to Christ, to confide everything to him, to trust him to make all things new, and to look to him for deliverance from the power of sin in this world and salvation beyond the grave. Christ welcomes such a seeker. He does all for him that he needs and is with him, helping him in this life, supporting him in sickness and in health, in prosperity and adversity, and finally taking him to heaven.

It was a sight never to be forgotten—that of the tall, spare man, with his white hair and his patriarchal beard, his hands clasped behind him as he swayed to and fro in the earnestness of his appeal, pleading with his hearers to accept the salvation so freely offered. It was, as he pathetically reminded them, probably the last time he would ever make that plea. His long service of seventy-nine years was, as he was fully conscious, drawing to a close, and he desired to give his testimony to the power of the Gospel to change the heart and life.

A Notable Golden Wedding

A LARGE representative gathering took place at West London Tabernacle recently on the anniversary of the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Varley, who are equally well known in the United Kingdom, America, and Australia. For several years past Mr. Varley has had his head centre at Melbourne, Australia, but he has taken extensive voyages and journeys at intervals to prosecute his work as an evangelist.

Mrs. Varley has accompanied her husband during many of his wanderings. Never were two individuals more happily adapted for work as Christian yokefellows. After a felicitous union of fifty years, they have the joy of knowing that all their children are partners with themselves in the Master's service.

The celebration at West London Tabernacle was rendered pathetic by Mr. Varley's reminiscences, and by a beautiful little speech in which Mrs. Varley told the story of her own conversion as a girl. Mr. Varley told how in his early childhood he was naturally so combative and quarrelsome that he was the subject of special prayer in the home. His mother's petitions were answered—he was converted.

The career of this septuagenarian servant of God has been a romance of realism. He early learned the conditions of business by engaging strenuously in it in West London. At the same time, he gave his spare time to religious work and developed that extraordinary gift of eloquence which brought crowds to hear him. To gain funds to enable him to carry on voluntary work, both as evangelist and pastor, he emigrated to Australia and spent a few years in hard toil. His efforts were crowned with success. He returned to England, married the lady of his choice, who had waited for him in London, and definitely launched out on his lifelong enterprise as a worker for Christ among men. His mission in West London was blessed with fruitfulness.

Henry Varley

At the golden wedding function, some of his old friends delivered the testimony of their continued admiration and constant sympathy. Among these were the Rev. David Baron, the Rev. W. Fuller Gooch, Mr. Russell Hurditch, Rev. John Wilson, and others. Mr. Varley reminded his hearers of the hard days of his youth as well as of the bright years of his success and prosperity. He came to London as an orphan, with only a few pence in his pockets, got a place as an errand boy and found that God was with him to lighten every difficulty and to help him at every step.

He has been the colleague and friend of many another famous preacher. The late Mr. Moody was one of his most loving associates. On the occasion of Mr. Moody's last campaign in Britain, he telegraphed Mr. Varley to come to his help.

In almost every part of the Anglo-Saxon world there are living those who ascribe their conversion to Mr. Varley's preaching. One is astonished at the undiminished power of his voice and the extraordinary vivacity of his manner. Although considerably over seventy, he displays not the slightest symptoms of physical failure, and his mental capacities are even stronger than ever. His old facility of swaying an audience by magic declamation is still with him. He contemplates leaving England for Australia before the end of the year.

London, England. REV. WM. DARLOW.

Surprised and Delighted

Dear Dr. Klopsch: People express surprise in acknowledging receipt of the two volumes of "Forty Thousand Striking and Beautiful Thoughts," for which my heart thanks. I wish I could tell you how much I can give so much for the price. They are too good for me to keep, and I intend to place in a missionary box that I intend them to a training school or academy.

An Excellent Movement

AMONG the many movements that are the index of our progressive age, one of the most deserving is that which has for its object the Federal regulation of public health. Under the title of the "Committee of One Hundred," an organization has been effected which includes in its membership many Americans who are recognized authorities in practical science, philanthropy, and all that relates to the moral and physical welfare of the masses of population in our great cities. This influential body will operate under the auspices of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and its field will embrace practically the whole country.

When one reflects upon the great and varied problems that are constantly confronting State and local authorities, especially in the cities, it is surprising that such a movement should have been so long deferred. While there are some physical perils that are peculiar to certain localities, and others that affect certain classes of the population, by far the larger number are common to us all, and apparently unescapable in the present incongruous and conflicting condition of the health laws in different States. It has been bluntly asserted, for instance, that the contaminated waters of the Ohio represent a thousand miles of typhoid, and that many other rivers are full of deadly impurities. Polluted rivers, streams, and lakes carry contagion, in drinking water and ice, to countless multitudes. This tremendous problem must be taken up, soon or late, by Congress, and the Committee of One Hundred will strive to have it considered during the coming session.

Hardly less formidable is the consumption problem—how to arrest or minimize the ravages of the "Great White Plague," which every year carries off more than 100,000 victims. Impure milk, with the resultant "massacre of the innocents"; diseased meat; the criminal adulteration of various staple food commodities; the suppression of the mosquito pest by improved drainage and swamp reclamation; yellow fever and the bubonic plague, will each have to be dealt with, not superficially but exhaustively, for there is not one on the list which does not constitute a life-or-death problem for many. Germane also to the general question of public health are tenement conditions, sweat-shops, child labor in the mines and factories North and South, unhygienic schools, and many other existing evils which are only too familiar to the majority of our people.

With all our boasted wealth, progress and invention, we have still to learn and to apply in our daily lives the rudimentary principles of public hygiene. Our Department of Agriculture in Washington has done much in a scientific way toward bettering the surroundings and living conditions of our domestic animals. Congress will now have an opportunity to do something for conserving the health, happiness and physical well-being of the people as a whole. Public money could be spent in no wiser way than in bringing about such a result.

Ministerial Salaries

VERY interesting are the replies elicited by the question recently asked by the editor of the Expositor, "What can the minister himself do to obtain an increase of salary?" Professors in theological seminaries, ministers and Christian laymen have, in reply, suggested ways in which the minister may increase his income, but there are few that will commend themselves to the consecrated servant of Christ. One of them openly advises that "he should increase his pay by running his church and by running himself on business principles." Another, a prominent merchant, thinks that "the work of the church suffers in its financial parts because the people are not taught the Scriptural method of giving and because the financial work is not followed up, as business men follow up their secular business." Another suggests that the minister "be active and he will always find something to which he can turn his hand to make a little money."

We most devoutly hope that no minister will heed any of these suggestions. It is no part of his duty to devote himself to such matters. His duty is to preach the Gospel. "It is not reason," said the apostles, "that we should leave the word of God to serve tables," and they bade the church elect deacons to attend to that business. What answer would Paul have made to the advice to run his churches "on business principles"? The minister who is busy "following up the financial work of the church as business men follow up their secular business," or is looking around for something to which he can "turn his hand to make a little money," should be in business, where he can make more money than in the pulpit. The combination does not work. It is the attempt to make it work that has led to church fairs, church suppers and other abominations. There are some preachers who labor in secular occupations all the week, that they may preach the Gospel free of charge on the Lord's day. All honor to such men, but the churches they serve must feel very mean. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," but we would not have him so concerned about his hire that he is hunting it in the pulpit.

The duty of attending to the finances rests upon the church officers; it is to them the minister should apply. When the minister stands before his congregation, as an ambassador of Christ, knowing that before him there may be men in need of encouragement, in need of warning, in need of consolation, or men anxiously longing to be taught the way of salvation, can he dare devote his sermon to an appeal for the church funds, or for his own salary? He should not have to plead for such matters. If his people have learned to consecrate themselves to God, if they have been taught what they owe to Christ, they will give willingly and spontaneously, and will not need to be scourged to the offering. That is the minister's legitimate work. He should labor to raise the spirituality of the church, to inculcate the spirit of self-sacrifice that was in Christ, and he will find that among the graces that will be developed this grace of giving will not be lacking.

Judge Not

TO thoughtful people, any occurrence which suggests sensationalism in the pulpit is a matter to be regretted. It is not pleasant to have your favorite pastor criticized as one given to thoughtless utterances, or who is willing to sacrifice dignity and influence for the sake of exciting a temporary flutter and attracting notice in the public prints. Still less agreeable would it be to have one we respected—whether preacher or layman—classed in the same category with the vertiginous alarmist who, on the slightest excuse, or none at all, bellows "Fire!" in a densely crowded auditorium. Even in the highest flights of pulpit eloquence, sanity and judgment are not to be dispensed with. The preacher who revels in exaggeration, drawing upon his imagination for his facts, is in a fair way to lose both audience and influence together.

We are led to make these observations apropos of the extraordinary statements attributed to a New York pastor who, discussing the recent panic, declared it to be "a divine judgment sent upon a mammon-following race. God," he added, "has been forgotten in America for years." Furthermore, being in the oracular mood, he predicted for the metropolis a punishment like that of the wicked cities of ancient days, unless New Yor awoke to its shocking spiritual condition and speedil repented.

It is sometimes well to call a spade a spade; but t stretch truth out of all recognition for the sheer love c sensation is inexcusable. It is evident that the speak in this case knew little or nothing of the real facts, el he would have been discreetly silent, instead of indul ing in denunciations as meaningless as they were ina plicable. Had he made the slightest inquiry as to t causes of the panic, he would never have uttered th words he did, for then he would have discovered tha honor and integrity are not unknown in the banks an counting-houses of New York, and that the noblest ro in the recent time of trouble was that played by th very men he so bitterly denounced.

Such utterances, we repeat, do not dignify the pulpi but tend rather to lessen its power and influence. W would urge all who are tempted to such vituperative ex hibitions in future to bear well in mind the words c One who had the divine omniscience which they lack and who mingled with it the broadest charity toward all "Those eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fe and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above a men? . . . Judge not, that ye be not judged."

The Sailing of the Fleet

ON the eleventh of December, America's fleet of bat tleships will be ready for the long cruise to th Pacific. The ships of the fleet have been in the variou navy yards to be overhauled and put in thorough re pair. They will assemble in the waters of Hampto Roads. President Roosevelt and members of th cabinet will go down from Washington on the gunboa Mayflower, to have a farewell talk with Admiral Evan and wish the fleet godspeed on its voyage aroun South America. The finest ship of the fleet, the nev Connecticut, will be the first to weigh anchor, an then the entire line will steam past the Mayflower i review.

There is no part of the country that is not greatl interested in a prosperous voyage for our fleet. Ever State in the Union is represented by officers and men. I is expected that the fleet will reach its destination som time in April. People who are somewhat easily alarme have said that the arrival of the fleet in Pacific water would be a firebrand, and that other nations who hav interests in the Pacific would take its presence there as hostile act. Their alarm is needless. The waters of th Pacific belong as much to America as to any othe country and the presence of one of our fleets off th coast of California is no more a hostile demonstratio than it would be if the same ships were off the coast o Maine. In fact, in the latter case they would be neare the territory of a foreign country than they would be i the Philippines. A number of years ago our weste coast was practically denuded of all warships, and it ha been the intention of the Navy Department for some tim to see that a few ships were returned to stations there.

Japan recognizes America's right to patrol the Pacific and the recent utterances of Count Hayashi, Minister o Foreign Affairs at Tokio, show plainly how Japan feel toward America. He said he spoke not only as a foreig minister, but as representing the entire cabinet and th public. He declared that the relations between Japa and America were as smooth and cordial as ever, an that the cause of civilization, as well as community o interest, demanded their lasting peace and friendship.

Our Readers' Great Work in India

POONA, INDIA, October 8, 1907.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: Your kind letter of the 5th ultimo to hand together with your kind draft for $10,000, representing your fina payment for the support of two thousand orphans to the end o this year, which I have to acknowledge with hearty thanks.

Your statement as to the above remittance, practically closin your connection with the India Famine Orphan Work, i deeply regretted by me, and, will in like manner be regrette by those in charge of orphanages when communicated t them. Your self-sacrificing labors and heroic effort in under taking so gigantic a charity, and faithfully carrying it ou whether the donors have paid in or not, for the long term of seve years, is marvelous indeed! The great thanks due you from th orphans you have fed, those in charge of the orphanages and my self, and the members of this committee, cannot really be expresse in words; but simply we can bow our heads and pray for your goo self and all the good donors who have very kindly contributed.

This benevolent fund will ever remain as a monument in th minds of those who have been helped, and will be cherished wit heartfelt gratitude to the end of their lives. God bless you an all supporters. W. H. STEPHENS, Secretary and Treasurer.

Kings in Council

A REMARKABLE gathering of royalties in Windsor Castle, England, is attracting the interest of the whole civilized world. King Edward of England has as guests the Kings of Spain and Norway and the Emperor of Germany with their wives. In one respect it is a family party, for King Edward is the uncle of the Emperor; the father-in-law of the King of Norway, and the uncle-in-law of the King of Spain. The most important of the party is the Emperor, and his visit has more than ordinary significance. There has been for some years a common belief that the relations of the two potentates were somewhat strained, and the people of the two nations certainly shared that feeling. Commercial rivalry and political jealousy had done their part, and the friendly relations King Edward had succeeded in bringing about with France and Russia appeared to have increased the alienation between him and his nephew. It is therefore a welcome sign of amity that the Emperor should have consented to join the family party. Arrangements have been made on a large scale to entertain him, in which the municipality of London will have a share. The new King of Norway, with his wife, King Edward's daughter, and the little prince their son, will also receive a cordial welcome from the English people. King Haakon is personally popular, and his wife, whose resemblance to her mother, the beloved Queen Alexandra, is remarkable, has long had a strong hold on English hearts. To the King of Spain, too, whose boyish spirit and democratic tastes commend him to the people, a hearty greeting is assured. His young wife, the daughter of King Edward's brother, accompanies him to visit the scenes of her girlhood. He also brings his newborn heir with him as an unconscious participant in the royal festivities. Windsor Castle, where the illustrious guests are entertained is the most magnificent of King Edward's residences. It has been the favorite home of the English kings for more than five hundred years, and its historical associations extend far beyond that period to the time when King Arthur held his court with the knights of the Round Table on its site. It was a stronghold in the time of the Saxons, before the coming of William the Conqueror, and its present Round Tower is built on the circular mound erected in those early times. Most of the later kings have added to its beauties, either of interior or exterior, though many of them were destroyed by the Roundheads of Cromwell's time. The royal chapels, in which the bodies of many of the English sovereigns are interred, are under its roof, and its spacious apartments, decorated with specimens of treasure from all the quarters of the globe, render the castle a storehouse of historic interest. It may be hoped that the royal gathering under its ancient roof may tend to promote the peace and amity of the nations and that all the potentates may remember Him of whom it is said:

It is he that giveth salvation unto kings. (Ps. 144: 10.)

Manufactured Gems

An address was made to the Academy of Sciences in the French capital recently on the discoveries of Professor Bordass. It described the results of the professor's experiments with radium, when it is applied to ordinary glass. He had found that uncolored glass becomes of a beautiful azure tint under the influence of radium. Still more remarkable was the effect of bringing radium in contact with corundum, the aluminum oxide, of which emery is the granular variety. The professor bought a quantity of corundum for a quarter, and subjected it to the influence of radium for a month. The uncolored corundum had then become yellow like the topaz; blue corundum had taken the hue of emerald and the violet had become like the sapphire. The chemist from whom he had bought the corundum for a quarter was eager to purchase it, after its varied transformations, at nine dollars a carat, and for one variety that had become like a ruby he offered a hundred dollars a carat. It is marvelous that mere contiguity with this wonderful agent should suffice to change common material into jewels. Such changes the apostle assures us may be made in the spiritual world when the sinner is brought into association with Christ.

We all with unveiled face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord are changed into the same image from glory to glory. (II. Cor. 3: 18.)

A Hermit's Death

In an old shanty on Long Island a man died recently who had led an extraordinary life. His apology for a house contained only one room and it was in the last stage of dilapidation. Its ceiling had fallen in and had been repaired with strips of old bed-ticking in place of plaster. The only furniture was a chair, a table and a cot. Around the shanty were a few acres of ground which had been cultivated, and were generally supposed to be the only source of the owner's livelihood. They were chiefly devoted to the raising of strawberries, which commanded a good price from dealers. The place belonged to a man nearly ninety years old who had lived there in complete seclusion for more than fifty years. No one visited him, and the only times that he was seen outside the boundaries of his farm were in his rare periodical visits to the village grocery store. He was found dead in his room recently, dressed in a suit of clothes that would barely hold together. The man's nearest relatives were cousins, who took possession of his dwelling after his death. They found money hidden in books and in queer hiding-places to the amount, it is said, of fifteen thousand dollars, and more is being found in the careful search they have instituted. It is difficult to understand what pleasure the man could have found in denying himself food and clothes and comforts that he might accumulate money. That he did find pleasure in it there can be no doubt, yet such a life seems akin to insanity. It only shows how avarice distorts the mental equilibrium and leads a man to folly.

There is one [illegible] child for [illegible] and [illegible] eye, and [illegible] and harvest [illegible] travail. (Isa. 66: 8.)

Windsor Castle, Where the Meeting Takes Place

A Bomb-Carrier Killed

A mysterious murder is exercising the skill of the detective force in Brooklyn, N. Y. A policeman found in an unfrequented street a man who had been stabbed to death. He summoned an ambulance and had the body removed to the police station. There an examination was made, which revealed the fact that the dead man had in his pocket a revolver fully loaded. But the strangest feature of his equipment was a bomb, hidden under his clothing. It was about the size of a grapefruit, and was covered with a narrow tape of paper, which wrapped it securely, and was attached to a [illegible] of the bomb. It was filled with coarse blasting powder, such as has been used in bombs with which the [illegible] A letter in his pocket showed where he had been boarding, and the owner of the house was sent for. He recognized the body as that of a man who had lived in his house for several months. He said the man was a Sicilian, who had no employment, but always seemed to have plenty of money. In his room [illegible] letters were found indicating that he was engaged in extorting money by threats. It is conjectured that he had gone out to execute one of the threats, and that some partner with whom he was working had quarreled with him and killed him. Little did he think, when he armed himself and went out with the instrument of destruction to kill, that he would himself have to take his own medicine. But so in unexpected ways God's warnings against sin are fulfilled.

Is not destruction to the wicked and a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity? (Job 31: 3.)

A New Anæsthetic

Experiments in the use of electricity as an anæsthetic are being made by the College of Physicians and Surgeons in connection with Columbia University. The experiments are conducted by Dr. E. W. Scripture, who, as one of the beneficiaries of the Carnegie Fund, has been studying at Munich. He is aided by some of the professors of the University. The work is based on the discoveries of Professor Leduc of the College of Medicine at Nantes, France. The system is different from other applications of electricity yet used. Its principal feature is an "interrupter," capable of producing thousands of interruptions in a minute. The tension is low, but the direction constant. It produces electric sleep, during which the patient is entirely unconscious of pain. When the current is withdrawn there is immediate return to consciousness without the unpleasant sensations that follow the administration of chloroform or ether, or the half-hour interval while the patient is recovering. The surgeons at the laboratory are not yet fully satisfied, but they are hopeful that with greater experience in the application, a new era in surgery will begin. The uses to which electricity may be applied seem endless. This is a new aspect of the power, in strange contrast to its other effects. The condemned criminal seated in the [illegible] chair trembles as if it appalled, while the patient on the operating table welcomes its merciful power. The agent that serves us [illegible] when turned against us. It is [illegible] all our blessings. [illegible] itself may prove a [illegible] tion when it is [illegible]

NEW YORK'S GREAT STATION

VISITORS coming to New York in a year or two will find great changes in the ways of reaching and leaving the metropolis. At the present time, if they come from the West or South, they disembark from their trains in the great ferry-houses at Jersey City or Hoboken. The boats then take them to any one of several stops on the island of Manhattan, where the older part of the city of New York seems ready to wade out into the North or East River in order to get more room. If they come from New England, and are on their way to Philadelphia and Washington, their train comes down as far as Mott Haven, just north by the Harlem River. Then the train is broken into sections and run on board a great steam ferry-boat that is provided with several sets of tracks. The ferry-boat with its load of cars and passengers then steams clear around New York City to New Jersey. There the trains are run ashore and go puffing on their way to the south and southwest.

All of this will be changed as soon as the great Pennsylvania station is completed in New York City and is connected with the several tunnels that have been constructed to the New Jersey shore on the west, and to Long Island on the east.

At the north of New York City a series of bridges will carry the tracks from New England to Long Island. The trains will run down Long Island to Long Island City. There they will shoot down under the East River, as the lower end of Long Island Sound is called, and pass under New York City to the new station on the west side. Then the train will pass under the North River, another name for the lower part of the Hudson, and come to the surface again in New Jersey. The trains direct from the north and northwest will run as now into the Grand Central Station at Forty-second Street. When all of the new bridges and tunnels are completed, thousands of people who are compelled by present transit conditions to live in New York, will move out on Long Island and into New Jersey. Towns in both are undergoing wonderful development in anticipation of the new improvement, which will effect marvelous changes in New York and vicinity.

The new Pennsylvania station, when completed, will cover an area of twenty-nine acres, or a space fifteen times larger than that covered by the mammoth Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. It will be one thousand three hundred feet long, four hundred and sixty feet wide and one hundred and fifty feet high. It is estimated that by the time the painters and masons put the finishing touches on the building over ten millions will have been paid for materials and work alone. The land two or three years ago was covered with hundreds of brick and stone buildings. All of these had to be purchased and torn down. For the land the company paid over twelve millions. Over twelve thousand people living in the four hundred buildings on the site were compelled to move.

The cars running under the new structure will have electricity as their motive power, and electricity will be used as far out as Port Washington. The total cost for terminals, electrification of the suburban lines and the construction of the tunnels will exceed sixty millions.

The picture given on our cover shows the only point where the cars are visible between Long Island City and New Jersey. The iron-work, of which there are thousands of tons in the new station, has been made as ornamental as possible by the architects. The roof is entirely of glass. The exterior is of a beautiful classic design, with many rows of supporting stone pillars. It will be a fine addition to the artistic buildings used for public purposes in the "greater city." As one watches so many large structures in the course of demolition and erection, he is reminded of the expression of a small boy who said, "New York will be a fine city when they get it finished, won't it?"

The Contents of Our New Bible

The Version used in this Bible is that known as the King James or Authorized Version. The Spelling is modern. The References are in the centre of the page. The Text of the Bible is set in bold face minion, and covers 1,203 pages. Then there are 268 pages of Helps and 17 Excellent Maps. The volume measures 6¾ inches in length, 4½ inches in width and 1 inch in thickness, and weighs only 20 ounces. The result is a gem of a Bible, small in size, easily packed, light in weight, very legible, very durable and beautiful to look upon —the greatest achievement in modern Bible-making.

Our New Bible

TWO years ago I set my heart upon making a better Bible for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers than could then be found on the market. I determined that the Bible should be small; that the type should be large; that the paper should be thin and of light weight; that there should be References, Helps and Maps, and that the Binding should be as good as the best. The result of our efforts is stated below, and I feel sure that every prospective purchaser will be delighted with the new Bible. LOUIS KLOPSCH.

The Type of Our New Bible

We looked over all the different faces of type and found none that suited our ideas as to legibility, so we had a type specially designed, and had steel dies cut from which to cast it. There were 125 different characters cut and cast, and when the work was done we considered that it was not as good as it might have been. Then we ordered a new set of steel dies from another type foundry, and when that type was cast we discovered that some of the characters were weak, and these we supplanted by other and better ones. Finally we finished the whole 125 characters, and every one was practically perfect. A better type for the purpose has never yet been devised.

The Paper of Our New Bible

We made a thorough search in American and English paper markets, but they had nothing to offer as good as we required it. Finally a firm of American paper brokers undertook to have manufactured for us in Italy a paper that promised to prove altogether satisfactory, and when it arrived, six months after the order was given, we found that it measured up to all that had been claimed for it. It is India paper, made in Italy, almost as thin as onion skin, and yet so thoroughly opaque that, when seen in the Bible, one can scarcely believe that it is printed on both sides, for not a letter in the entire book shows through. Then the paper is so light that the entire Bible with Helps and Maps weighs only one pound and four ounces.

As to the Binding

In a book so valuable, so important, and so exquisite, the binding must needs be in keeping with the contents; hence, in settling on the material to be used for the binding, we determined that it must be rich, durable, flexible and attractive. After examining many varieties and many grades, we decided to use real Morocco, the same as is used only on the costliest Bibles. The Standard Dictionary defines real Morocco as "A leather made from goat skin; named after the City of Morocco. It was originally a product of the Levant, Turkey and Mediterranean Africa, and is distinguished for pliancy, fineness and toughness of texture, which fit it particularly for bookbinding." This correctly describes the leather which we selected and in which the entire edition has been bound.

Of course this Bible is bound in Divinity Circuit. That is, it has round corners, red under gold, and overlapping edges. There is no more attractive Bible on the market. It is made of the best materials throughout, and five years ago $15 would have been considered the right price.

Exclusively for Christian Herald Subscribers

As it took six months to secure the paper and six months to print the edition, it will be out of the question to get additional copies until the Fall of 1908; hence we are determined to reserve this entire edition of 10,000 for CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers exclusively.

The Price of Our New Bible

A Bible manufactured on such generous lines must necessarily be an expensive one. At least it would seem so. India Paper Bibles bound in real Morocco and Leather Lined are seldom listed at less than $10; even then they are not Red Letter Bibles, which feature adds materially to the cost. But we know that but few people can afford to pay that much money for a Bible, and as we are anxious to ultimately secure for this superb book a circulation of at least a million copies, we have decided to put this first Edition at an Introductory Bargain Price. Here it is: Any subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who acts before these ten thousand Bibles are sold may, by sending Four Dollars, have his subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD renewed for one year, and receive, all charges prepaid, one of these Superb New Red Letter Bibles. Money refunded if not fully pleased. Address:

DUTY AND OPPORTUNITY

WHAT would you do if, instead of a slender in come that by hard economy meets your annua wants, you had a goodly sum anywhere from ten t fifty thousand a year? What would you do if you ha wealth instead of poverty?

The immediate answer of most people to this questio is, "If I had money on which I could draw at discre tion, I would help every one who was straitened; would aid harassed and struggling friends. I woul be generous in my gifts and I would have a good time."

Perhaps you would. American millionaires are doin all this, as they have opportunity, although there is s much to be done that they seem to make little impres sion on the great mass of those who live from hand t mouth. No matter how liberal they are, they are cen sured and criticized, both for what they do and fo what they leave undone. It would probably be th same with those who look with a certain envy on me and women who go about the world as they choose, wh possess steam yachts and motor-cars, live in ampl houses and are waited upon by numerous servants. Th manner of their giving seldom satisfies the spectato They endow colleges, build libraries and erect hospitals but there is ever a low murmur of complaint that the do not extend a helping hand to the widow whose littl cot is encumbered with a mortgage, to the young gir desiring a musical education, and to the gifted studen who aspires to an art training abroad. The fact is tha no fortune is boundless, and that the owner of a for tune must select his beneficiaries; while he has an un doubted right to give or withhold his means at hi pleasure.

Frequently there is a wiser frugality and a close economy exercised in the homes of the rich than i those of the poor. It might surprise some of those wh anticipate the wages of a coming week by freely pur chasing on credit, to learn that men and women o large wealth maintain strict vigilance in keeping thei accounts, and absolutely refuse to allow wilful wast in any department.

To return to the proposition, "What would you do i you were rich?" a candid reply for many would be tha they would, by timely assistance, prolong the lives o some among their kindred who were over-working, an who could not afford so much as a temporary halt. W may be sure that most of us would not exaggerate ou disposition to be kind, and would speak only the litera truth should we say that our desire for wealth woul not be that we might have more freedom or more self indulgence, but that we might have more to spen for others.

As wealth and poverty are relative terms, it may b worth while to consider that practically any one is ric who lives within his income, and is able to lay up some thing for a rainy day; and that equally any one is poo who spends more than he earns, and is forever on th "ragged edge" of pecuniary anxiety. Judging fro observation, the inference is that if the poor man o to-day should become the rich man of to-morrow, h would not materially change his character, and his im pulses to generosity might even be less frequent an less imperative then than now.

Among the Workers

—REV. ARTHUR J. SMITH, evangelist, has lately been conductin services in New London, N. H., where many students and town people have made public confession of faith.

—EVANGELIST ROBERT L. LAYFIELD, wife and singer, began unio meetings November 10, at Great Bend, Kan. The meetings ar held in a tabernacle built specially for the purpose.

—A REVIVAL held lately at Rosendale, Mo., resulted in twenty six confessions of saving faith. The pastor of the M. E. Churc Rev. J. J. Henley, was assisted by Evangelist F. A. Geisenheine of Decatur, Ill.

—EVANGELIST E. L. WADE, of Johnstown, N. Y., has successfull conducted revival services at Richmondville, Binghamton, Worce ter, McGraw and other points in New York State. Many professe conversion, and the churches were greatly revived.

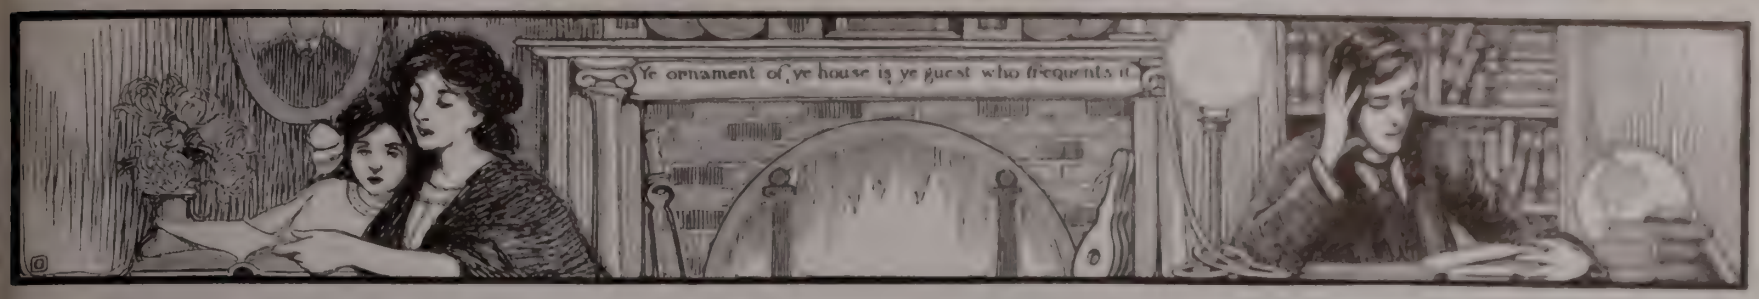
—MR. AND MRS. JOSEPH MEDILL MCCORMICK, of Chicago, hav decided to devote their energies to settlement work among th Slovaks, Poles, Bohemians and Lithuanians of the Western me tropolis. Both are enthusiastic, and, being in control of ampl means, may be enabled to do much good.

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., have jus closed a successful union revival meeting in the city of Seattl Wash., where a large wooden tabernacle was erected to hold th services, which accommodated over 3,000 persons. Two larg meetings for men only were held, about 6,000 men attending th services. Over 85,000 attended in all, and over 1,200 souls pr sented themselves as seekers in the month's meetings. On th closing day 169 made profession of faith.

—ROBERT F. Y. PIERCE, D.D., of Scranton, Pa., recently held remarkable Gospel service in a theatre at Lowell, Mass., su rounded by actors, chorus singers and a regular theatre-goin audience. The occasion was most signally blessed in touchin many hearts. Many in the audience were melted to tears. Th management has six theatres, and urged the preacher to conse to speak at all of them and to preach Christ to the people.

—THE CONVENTION Programme Committee of the Presbyteria Brotherhood of America has its plans in definite shape for th coming Convention. The sessions will be held in Music Hall, Ci cinnati, which seats 3,000 people and is well provided with small rooms for conferences and committees. Dr. Ira Landrith of Nash ville, Tenn., will act as Convention secretary. The programm will have two main aims: the cultivation of religious interest an the exchange of information on practical plans. There will be prayer hour each morning of the Convention. Large time will b devoted to workable plans of organization.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

This Beautiful World

"I THINK we are too ready with complaint in this fair world of God's." What a fuss we make if we waken in the morning and find rain dashing against the windows, when a fine day would have suited our plans better! How apt we are to frown at the sleet and the snow, and how difficult, on the whole, we are to please in the matter of winds and skies, clouds, storms and sunshine! "What sort of weather shall we have to-morrow?" some one asked the Shepherd of Salisbury Plain. "It will be such weather as pleases me," replied the Shepherd. "How do you know?" was the natural inquiry, and the answer came, "It will be such weather as pleases God, and that will please me."

Grumbling about the weather is stupid and futile, because no amount of it ever persuaded a northeast gale to stop blowing, or arrested the progress of the stars, or stayed the ebb and flow of the tides. Yet people who grumble at little else, do not feel in the least ashamed to be heard grumbling because it is too hot, too cold, too wet or too dry for their satisfaction.

One of the wonders of this age to which we have grown accustomed, and which we accept as if it were a commonplace thing, is the fact that there are men stationed all over the country who watch the weather, study the upper currents of the air, note indications and predict days beforehand the storm that is coming, the cold wave or the warm, and the exact course the tempest may take. Among the miracles of modern life none would have been more surprising to our forefathers than the predictions of the weather bureau, and few men are really more heroic than the watchers who endure hardships in the signal service.

This world is very beautiful. We walk under the sky, now intensely blue, again softly gray; now like an ocean over which great fleets sail, and again swept clear of every cloud. This autumn we have seen again the pageant of the ripened leaves, the deep red, the amber, the opal and the yellow that make the forests so gorgeous and the mountain-sides so magnificent in their bannered pomp. We had the spring and the summer, we have had the autumn, and presently we shall have the white sparkling winter with beauty and brightness broadcast everywhere. Ought we not to be happy in this fair world of God's?

The lovely poem sent by a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has its fitting place just here:

MY FOUR WINDOWS

MY soul-house hath four windows, whence I look out and see
The wonderful world-pictures my Father paints for me;
The forest in its glory, the sunshine flecked with shade;
The bird-songs and the flowers his hand divine hath made.

Through sight and hearing windows, such wonders I behold.
And every time I look out, new wonders still unfold.
Hope's window, like a mirror, reflects the silent stars,
And helps my soul mount higher, beyond the sunset bars.

Of all, the one most sightly is Faith's that looks away
Over the mists and shadows, to bright and fadeless day:
Unlimited by mountains, nor kept by valley waits, [gates.
I see, through Faith's wide casement, heav'n's gold and pearly

I thank God for these windows, and for the sounds and sights
That fill my soul with rapture, and ever-new delights.
Through Hope's all bright with sunshine, rose-hued all things I see;
Through Faith's I sight the promise my Father makes to me.

A BURMESE CEREMONIAL

THE ceremonial dances of the Orient carry us back to a period of remote antiquity. Dancing or posturing in the East is now the province of a certain class who amuse guests after a banquet with their slow and graceful steps, while their anklets and bracelets make a tinkling melody. Their performance is still somewhat of the nature of the ancient heathen ceremonials, when there were dances for war or for peace, for rain, for seedtime and reaping, all being designed to placate the deities.

Table Manners

Among the minor exasperations that help to make a good wife discontented nothing is more annoying than the habit some men have of coming to the table in their shirt sleeves. "My husband," wrote a loving wife, not long ago, "never wears a coat in the house winter or summer. In winter he clings to red flannel underclothing, and the rim of scarlet at his wrists and the untidy way he has of tearing off his necktie when he gets through with the chores and has settled down for the evening simply take away my appetite. I have always kept up my girlish custom of changing my dress before supper, and have managed to do it with the cares of a family and the numerous tasks a wife and mother has on her hands when she is bringing up five sturdy boys. I really don't mind it so much for myself now that John never looks fit to be seen in the house as I mind it for the boys. He is setting them a bad example, and I have a hard time to make them decently neat indoors. Don't you think," she exclaimed, "that it is as great a breach of table manners to come to the table in one's shirt sleeves as to eat with one's knife?"

Well, I am afraid I must say that I do. My sympathies go with this correspondent who is asking no more than any wife should when she insists that her good man put on his coat when sitting with her at the table and around the lamp. He may very properly lay off his heavy outdoor coat, and assume a lighter one for the house, and she might try the effect of presenting him at Christmas with a house jacket or blazer that he will not mind wearing. If only she had girls to come home from college I fancy they would have some influence with their father in this every-day matter of being properly dressed in the house as well as out. Has not the good wife a claim to be treated with courtesy in so slight a thing?

The Children of the Poor

A TOUCHING illustration was recently given in a newspaper paragraph of the patience and courage with which the children of the poor early learn to carry burdens. A little girl of twelve appeared before a police magistrate in Brooklyn to ask that she might have time to pay the monthly rent, for lack of which the landlord had threatened eviction. To be unprovided of a home and thrown without shelter on the stony street is the continual terror of thousands in our great cities. The children learn almost before they can speak plainly that if necessary they must go hungry and endure cold so that the money for the rent may be saved. Little by little, and that there may be no delay in paying it when the agent calls.

Dickens in Little Dorrit painted a moving picture of the same state of affairs among the tenants of Bleeding Heart Yard, watching with apprehension and fear the periodical appearance of the redoubtable Mr. Pancks, collector of rents for an owner who was relentlessly hard while masquerading under a hypocritical pretense of charity. The place and time make little difference. The children of the poor are inured to distress from their cradles. By the poor is not meant in the very least the immense number of people of limited means who, by strict frugality, are able to pay as they go, but rather the large class whose chances to work are uncertain, and to whom illness or death in the family is an acute calamity.

The little girl alluded to lost her father last summer, and her mother being ill and in a hospital, the child of twelve took charge of the household, which consisted of an elder brother employed as a district messenger and of a younger sister. In addition she seems to have been a sort of unofficial mother's helper to other tenants in the house, looking after their babies in the long hours when the mothers were away at work.

The magistrate listened with a fatherly heart to the child's plea and had her case investigated, and funds have been raised to assist her in her time of need; but she is only one of thousands. Everywhere in the crowded sections of large towns little girls so soon begin to assume duties in connection with the bringing up of their families that the little mothers may be seen carrying babies, tugging along with toddlers clinging to their skirts, cheated of their own right to freedom and play. The happiest hours such children spend are those in the schoolroom, and their teachers are to them angels of goodness and kindness. Society owes a debt to the teachers of the public schools that it does not invariably recognize. Their salaries do not compensate them for the ungrudging labor they give, for their fidelity, tact and devotion, and for the care they take of the health and morals of the children in their classes.

The shadowy side of modern civilization is forgotten as it touches the children too early forced to bear burdens beyond their strength, and tethered to the bonds of circumstances, in dreary homes of poverty. Wherever one can reach a helping hand to a poor child, one may claim the blessing of the Saviour who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these my little ones, ye have done it unto me."

VICTORIES OF AN ARMY OF ONE

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE story of Samson is particularly suited to boys and men, but it is also of interest to girls and women, because it was a part of God's plan that Samson should have a strong mother. Even before Samson was born, God sent his angel to her to tell her to be careful about the kind of food she should eat, and to drink no wine, so that she might be strong. And God told her why he wanted her son to be strong: that when he should grow to be a man, he should be so strong that he would be able to fight the Philistines, the foes of his country.

Not only did the angel tell the mother that she must be careful about her food, and drink no wine, but the same rule was to apply to her son; he should never drink wine, and should always be the servant of the Lord, and as a sign that he was wholly the Lord's, he should always wear long hair.

Samson's Boyhood

If the whole story of Samson's boyhood and his mother's training was given in the Bible, we should no doubt have many beautiful and interesting things to read. That he was trained faithfully we know, because when Samson became a man he was stronger than any man in Israel. And he was a happy man, always telling jokes, and doing things to amuse people and make them laugh. Perhaps this is why his mother named him Samson, which meant "bright as the sun." His first recorded feat of strength was the killing of a lion by tearing its mouth with his two hands.

The Philistines soon learned what a strong enemy they had in Samson, and they were always on the watch to make a prisoner of him. One night in the city of Gaza they thought they surely had him, but he arose at midnight while the Philistines were fast asleep, and lifted the heavy gates on his shoulders and carried them off. Again and again they tied him with strong ropes, and even put fetters of brass upon them, but he broke them as if they had been threads. No doubt if Samson had been a good man he would have kept his strength to the end of his life; but he chose evil companions, the worst of whom was Delilah, a Philistine woman. One night, as he lay asleep, she cut off his long hair—the sign that he was God's servant. When Samson awoke, he found that God had taken his great strength away, and he was no stronger than any other man. Then the Philistines easily made him their prisoner, and compelled him to use what little strength he had left in grinding corn for them. And they put out his eyes, so that he might not see how to escape. They required him to dance and tell jokes to make them laugh. One day, when there was a great feast being held by the Philistines in honor of their fish-god Dagon, attended by thousands of people, they sent to the prison and brought out Samson to make sport for them. When Samson had danced and played the fool, he was set between two great pillars of the temple that the people might mock at him. But Samson bowed his head and prayed to God that for just once he would give him back his strength. God answered his prayer; and when Samson felt himself strong again, he arose from his seat, and seized the two pillars, and the temple fell, and three thousand Philistines were killed, and Samson gave his own life in destroying the enemies of his people.

God's Imperfect Instruments

In order to understand the death of Samson we must study his whole life. If he had not been placed in faith's honor roll in the eleventh of Hebrews, we should hardly count him more than a half-saved man. Except Balaam, he seems to be the least religious instrument that God used in Bible times. But his story is all the more encouraging to those who know their imperfections and doubt if God can use them.

Right early training makes up the first chapter of his life, and is the open secret of his final success, in spite of many faults and follies. His early training to be his country's champion began before his birth. That is a blind and selfish mother whose diet and devotion are not both influenced by her hopes for her unborn child. A mother who uses intoxicants is the worst of tipplers or topers, for she mortgages her child to the drink slavery. Samson's heredity was his mother's best gift to her son. She consecrated him through abstinence to physical strength and patriotic service. As Hannibal was devoted from childhood to the defense of his country against Rome, so was Samson to the defense of his country against the Philistines.

It is a good illustration of the power of early impressions that while Samson went far wrong with Delilah, he never broke his Nazaritic vow of abstinence or swerved from his consecration to the unpopular and difficult task of fighting the Philistines, not even when the leaders of his own people preferred dishonorable peace to honorable war. As his mother gave him a name meaning sunshine, we may fairly infer he owed to her in part his merry mood that lighted with riddles even tragic hours. God's people should be foremost in a reasonable amount of innocent mirth. Such joyousness as marks an Endeavorer convention train or a Y. M. C. A. summer camp should be less exceptional in the lives of those who really trust God with past and future and live in the noon of now. Let a smile become the Christian's rather than the devil's sign.

> We're weary a-walking the highway of life;
> We're fretted and fluttered with worry and strife;
> Let us drop by the wayside the heavy old load,
> And rest at the inn at the turn of the road—
> Let us tarry awhile
> At "The Sign of the Smile."

Lions in the way. Samson's first recorded feat of strength, preparatory to greater victories to follow, was his tearing asunder of a lion's jaws. So a young man's best preparations for the battles of life is the conquest of his own sins, that, like a lurking lion, threaten his safety. But he cannot win that battle alone. Many years ago a Lieutenant Harding, stationed at Natal, was ordered to explore the country inland for three hundred miles. He started with six trusty soldiers and his faithful servant Richard. One day they came on a pool of water where they discovered fresh footprints, that told it was a lion's drinking fountain. The lieutenant determined to shoot it, and so in the late afternoon, hid nearby with his servant. Soon after the sun went down the voices of other wild beasts were heard, and presently the roar of the lion. The officer fired, but unfortunately only grazed the skin of the lion, which thereupon bounded toward him and would have torn him in pieces, had not his faithful servant received the beast on his bayonet. But in so doing, he received a fatal stroke of the lion's paw. Richard was buried near the pool, and under his name were inscribed the words: "He died for me. T. Harding." The roaring lion of sin, that seeks to devour every soul, can only be conquered by Him who died for us, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.

Breaking the Bonds

Another of Samson's victories was his breaking of the cords with which his own people bound him, to deliver him to the Philistines. This may well represent the Christian's strongest temptations, those that come from his friends. It is so much easier to refuse an enemy or a stranger than a friend!

Samson's victory, as an army of one over a thousand Philistines, is the incident of his life that is of greatest encouragement to Christians. The Bible intimation that one shall chase a thousand is not hyperbole but history, a history that has often repeated itself, as when Jonathan, with only his armor-bearer, defeated another great company of Philistines; as when Jonah marched on mighty Nineveh as an army of one, and brought it to its knees; as when Nehemiah brought Sabbath-breaking Jews and foreigners in Jerusalem to obey the law; as when Peter conquered three thousand souls on the day of Pentecost. The writer visited Mr. Spurgeon's church years ago, and found there a Bible class teacher, Mrs. Bartlett, who had brought seven hundred persons from her class into membership in that church. She lived for years, and probably recruited a full regiment before she died. She was not an extraordinary woman, except in the completeness of her consecration to the work of winning souls. In one of the writer's own churches, there was a woman who had neither wealth nor beauty nor culture, who, by persistent devotion, had brought five hundred persons into the Sunday Schools. She, too, lived for years and probably completed her regiment. A young man in England, who had been converted in Mr. Moody's first evangelistic visit, on hearing he would return, vowed he would bring a thousand young men to hear him, and started a roll of all who could be induced to promise him to attend. He, too, recruited a full thousand. These are samples of the countless victories of an army of one. Often a whole city is distinctly influenced for good by one person, and, in many cases, it is a layman (Eccles. 9: 14-16).

Gates Thrown Open

Another labor of this Bible Hercules was releasing himself when imprisoned in Gaza by lifting the city gates off their hinges and bearing them away. Those who have seen the marvelous feats of strong men of our day will hardly doubt this story. It implies only a reasonable addition of miraculous power to feats that other men have done. This may well illustrate the omnipotence of prayer in opening the gates which block the Christian's path. Peter, about to be executed, walks out of his prison through a gate that opens before him mysteriously at the touch of invisible hands (Acts 12). So Mr. A. E. Moale, writing of Robert Morrison, the first missionary in China, says:

> The fast-barred, brazen gates unfold
> Before his wrestling prayer;
> The signs and phrase of culture old
> Shine clear in that pure air.

Prayer may well be considered the might of gentleness of which Longfellow wrote:

> Bear a lily in thy hand:
> Gates of brass cannot withstand
> One touch of that magic wand.

Alas, Samson's series of victories was broken by one almost fatal defeat. He who could conquer a thousand men, as in many another instance, was conquered by one woman. The blindness of his eyes that came as a result of Delilah's surrendering him, shorn of the token of his consecration, to his foes, was but the outward sign of the moral blindness that led him into such an open trap of lewdness, that always tends to weakness. He was the blind slave of Delilah before his eyes were put out for a slave's task.

Samson illustrates how strong a man may be in some points when he is weak as grass in others. The Egyptian obelisk in New York City has been more worn by frost in that city in twenty-six years than it was worn in thirty-four hundred years in the sunny, frostless air of Egypt. It endured under certain conditions. Under another environment it would have gone to destruction if it had not been treated. Samson could resist any temptation to drink or to turn from his purpose to fight the Philistines. But in the environment of Delilah he became as shifting sand. A wise father said to his boy, "There is something about most people to spoil them, and it is your business while young to discover what is wrong in your life and get to work to cure it."

The ship officer pointing shoreward said: "That point is Cape Bengut; it was there this ship was wrecked last voyage. It was April 20, a cold, foggy, murky night. The passengers had gone to bed. But scarcely were their lights out than an awful grating sound was heard. 'We are ashore!' was the cry. Great waves dashed broadside on the ship and leapt up mast high into the air, only to fall with a crash of thunder upon the deck. There was no more sleep that night. The engines were reversed. But for eleven days the vessel remained fast fixed. Then effort was rewarded, and to the relief of all she floated once more." "What happened to the captain?" "Well, he is a ruined man. He alone bears the blame." "Why not the helmsman?" "A helmsman is never to blame if he obeys orders." "It is hard on the unfortunate skipper." "No, it is a rule of the sea. For fourteen years and a half that man navigated his ship without accident. This one mishap ruined him."

A New Knightly Order

THE "boy problem" is one of deepening interest to the Sabbath School and to the church. If a boy has a strong body and an intelligent mind he will be able to make his own way in life. Every struggle increases his strength. If he has a longing for an education, he can work his way through college, as the writer of this article did, by pitching hay in summer and piling shingles in a cold sawmill in winter, receiving five cents for piling five hundred; the shingles of chestnut being so frosty as almost to freeze his fingers, and really making them bleed. Boys who have the will, will find the way.

Rev. Frank L. Masseck

Work "with" boys is more profitable than work "for" boys; since boys dislike to take soup from a charity spoon, and like to have a part in all that is going on that relates to themselves. If a boy has more than himself to care for, he is inspired by the fact that he can manage for mother and brothers and sisters, too.

This idea of mutual helpfulness and desire to do things with and for others, as exemplified in the lives of many boys whom he carefully studied, led the Rev. William Forbish, the founder of the General Alliance of Workers with Boys," to revive the order of the "Knights of King Arthur," and use its best principles in the solving of the "boy problem," in teaching gallantry, steadfastness and the strength and beauty of a life consecrated to Christ. The young are pleased by the noble legend and the chivalric character of the knights who, gathered around the table under the leadership of Arthur, guided by the noble-minded Merlin, so wrought as completely to transform the spirit of their age. Upon entering the order, each boy becomes a "page," and promises to obey and serve. He is given the name of some old knight, whom he is to emulate in character and service. When he evinces the right spirit he is advanced to the rank of "esquire," where he takes pledges of "temperance, reverence and purity." Later on, he is expected to be elevated to the rank of a "noble knight." He is "to follow the Christ as King, to live pure, to speak true, to right wrong." Merlin is a permanent officer. Merlin may be a man or a woman who loves the boys, and has time and is willing to devote life and energy for their upbuilding. Other officers are temporary. The initiation to the different degrees is quite interesting. They have grips, passwords, signs, signals, games, drills, debates, social hours, entertainments, but no secrets from their parents. Mr. Frank Lincoln Masseck, Potsdam, N. Y., is the present head of the order.

The Song That Stirred His Soul

EVANGELIST BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTTS, of Batesville, Miss., sends an interesting account of a revival at Waterview, Ky. The workers reached the place by four-horse stage across mountain roads. Services were held in the old Cumberland Presbyterian (now United) Church, erected in 1857. The programme was: Morning preaching, 10 to 12; then dinner, which was served to every one on the ground; then preaching from 1:30 to 4, and again at 7:30 P.M. The old church was filled at all the services. Towards the close of the meetings a day was set aside as "Old Folks' Day." Old songs were sung to old tunes, and a dulcimer made 125 years ago was used to accompany the singing.

About 160 confessed Christ at these meetings. Rev. J. R. Crawford, pastor of the Waterview church, but living at Banksville, Ky., at one service told this remarkable story:

"When at college in a Tennessee town I was awakened early one morning and handed a note from one of the pastors of the place. The note gave particular directions where to find the home of Mr. J., who was dying and who needed spiritual comfort. I at once hastened to the bedside of the dying man. I sat beside him talking to him out of God's Word and endeavoring to point him to Christ. He grew impatient and declared that he was lost, and that he could never be saved if he did not once more hear the words of a certain old camp meeting song that he had heard in other days. I asked him what the song could have to do with his being saved, and he replied:

"'Years ago, while attending a camp meeting, I was overwhelmed with conviction. The Holy Spirit's pleadings were so powerful that I decided to go to the altar. I started, and after taking a few steps in that direction, I deliberately turned around and left the church never to return. For years, the song the people were singing when I started echoed in my memory. My soul is lost if I never hear that song again.' Gathering up his dying strength, he shrieked to us to sing the song. We vainly tried all the old songs we could recall, but he would grow impatient at the first notes and declare we were mocking him. As death approached, he seemed to tighten his grip on my hand. He would listen to no words of comfort or instruction, but still moaned and begged us to 'sing the song' he could not recall. Thus he passed into eternity."

The President as a Pedestrian

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT loves walking, and is especially fond of walking in the rain. On a recent rainy afternoon, he sent for Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Beekman Winthrop. Leaving the White House in an open carriage, they were driven briskly up Seventeenth Street to the outskirts of the city, and the excursion began. Both were wet to the skin before the ride had ended. Plunging off into the woods of Rock Creek Park, the President led Mr. Winthrop on such a walk as only the President knows how to take. Up wild pathways, sliding down wet hillsides, holding on by branches and across country for ten miles, the excursion continued until Mr. Winthrop was gasping for breath and, with raindrops dripping from his beard, was ready to drop. Then by way of a finish, the President led the way to Rock Creek and plunged over the bank into the stream waist deep, crossing to the other side. Mr. Winthrop followed his chief and gained the other side, after which both went home for dry clothes and a rest.

The Books Are Jewels

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received last week the books "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." I am more than pleased with them. They are jewels, worth ten times what you ask for them. I hardly see how you can give so much for the money.

CLEARED AWAY

Proper Food Put the Troubles Away.

Our own troubles always seem more severe than any others. But when a man is unable to eat even a light breakfast, for years, without severe distress, he has trouble enough.

It is small wonder he likes to tell of food which cleared away the troubles.

"I am glad of the opportunity to tell of the good Grape-Nuts has done for me," writes a N. H. man. "For many years I was unable to eat even a light breakfast without great suffering.

"After eating I would suddenly be seized with a terrible attack of colic and vomiting. This would be followed by headache and misery that would sometimes last a week or two, leaving me so weak I could hardly sit up or walk.

"Since I began to eat Grape-Nuts I have been free from the old troubles. I usually eat Grape-Nuts one or more times a day, taking it at the beginning of the meal. Now I can eat almost anything I want without trouble.

"When I began to use Grape-Nuts I was under my usual weight, now I weigh 30 pounds more than I ever weighed in my life, and I am glad to speak of the food that has worked the change."

The Golden Rule Saloon

By MARION EARL

AT that instant May Johnson walked, breathless with haste, into the barroom and stepped quickly to the side of the fainting woman.

With the assistance of the senator and Lee, Mrs. Hood was placed in a chair and restored to consciousness. A boy had come in great haste from the poor farm to the Johnson home, with the news of her escape. May, who somehow had great influence over the demented woman, started at once to search, and had arrived at the front of the saloon, where she caught sight of her. They summoned a sleigh and wraps and took her away. Her mind was broken, but she saw some things with a saner view than many who are held in esteem by the world.

That was the strangest night ever passed in the Golden Rule Saloon. Some of the men went back to their games. But for the most part, there was a strange spirit of quietness over all. The men talked of the strange appearance and of the causes which had led up to it. Andy Neal was stirred deeply. He said some sharp, stinging words about the saloon business in general, and this saloon in particular. There was a current story that in his young days this man had felt called to enter the ministry. He had had careful religious training; but he was wild and wilful, and finally had drifted away from respectability and become a commonplace sot. Sometimes, under the influence of liquor, he had been known to preach sermons and make telling speeches. To-night the senator thought he saw a chance for a diversion and began to call upon Neal for a speech.

"That's right," some one seconded. "Give us a temperance address."

Others took up the demand, just for the amusement it might afford.

Finally Neal rose to his feet as if in consent. Eager hands were stretched forth and he was carried to the bar. Too drunk to stand easily, he sat on the marble top and began. He was in that state of intoxication and excitement in which words come freely.

"Gentlemen, I am a prohibitionist," he began.

"That's the way!" some one called by way of encouragement, while the men from the gaming tables crowded in to hear.

"This question is one of the most important questions in the world." The applause was great. "It is more important than the tariff!" Again they applauded. "And it is a many-sided question, gentlemen! The saloon is the most dangerous element in modern society. A place like this is worse than the lowest dive. It is like honey to a fly; it is like a siren's song. And I'll tell you what, men, you and I haven't got the stuff in us old Ulysses had when he tied himself tight to keep out of the danger. We are a lot of lambs, led without a sound to the slaughter. Mrs. Hood is right; this is a slaughter-pen. Why, men, there isn't one of us but would be better off if we never drank! Now here's the senator. He says it never hurts him. But look at him; what's he good for? What benefit is he to the community? He's one of the smartest men in the State—he used to be."

He pointed out different ones and told the unvarnished truth about them. The portrayal was so accurate that many heads drooped in shame. There was no escape from the facts. Homes blighted, wives and children mistreated and deprived of common necessities, men who were drifting instead of going forward on a manly career. It was the old, familiar picture; but he painted it that night with such skill and color that men saw and trembled.

"You are no worse than I am. I believe I am the worst specimen in the crowd. Nobody respects me and I have contempt for myself. But I wasn't always like this. I had the best mother a man ever had." He choked for a moment, then struggled free from his emotion. "She was tall and slender, very much like Mrs. Hood. I can't remember when I didn't kneel down when I went to bed and say,

"'Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.'

I can't help saying it yet, sometimes. But I didn't follow her teachings. I was a wild one, and pretty near broke her heart. She wanted to make a preacher of me; but I wouldn't. I got so wild that she was in despair. One night she knelt down by my chair and put her face down on my knees and wept and pleaded with me. I had been drinking and got angry and pushed her away. And when she clung to my feet I kicked her! I did, men—I kicked my own mother!"

He paused and the tears came, which he wiped away on his sleeve. "Then I ran away from home. When I was married I thought I could straighten up. I did for a few months; but I couldn't stick to it—not with a saloon close by. I can't stop. Folks despise me, but I haven't got the will to resist the appetite. I wouldn't have done what I did to Lucy, not for all the world, but I was crazy drunk. I'll tell you the truth, men: there is no use our trying to be decent while there are saloons at hand to draw us in. And Mrs. Hood was right about the young men, too. They come into a place like this, and get the habit, when they never would get it anywhere else. Lee here is a worse man than Marvin. His place is more attractive. It makes a man think it is respectable to drink, but it never can be."

For a half hour he poured forth an address that was powerful in its effect on his strange audience. He closed with an appeal to the manhood of the men.

"What am I going to do?" he demanded. "I am almost a hopeless case. If I go on, I will go as Hood did. And I don't know as I can stop. Maybe I could, if the saloon was out of the way. The rest of you are coming my way. Some of you will get where I am, after a while. Let's quit where we are, and let's drive the saloons out of business."

Strange as the record seems, a hastily written pledge was passed around and many signed it. Lee watched the proceedings with amusement and seriousness. Some one called his name and repeated what Mrs. Hood had said about his responsibility for the habits of the men, and this made him angry. When angry, he was always stubborn. So he allowed another chance to go by, and looked upon the matter as a passing spasm of feeling.

Next morning, Andy Neal and several of his acquaintances called at the parsonage. Neal was dead in earnest in promoting the cause he had publicly espoused. He felt, as he said, that it was his last chance of escape from himself. The preacher in astonishment showed the delegation into his study.

"I suppose you are surprised to see us here," Neal began. Then he told briefly what had happened at the saloon the night before, and ended with an appeal that came from the very depths of his heart.

"Won't you help us in this matter? I tell you, sir, it is my only hope. If I get down again, it's all over with me. And I am only one who is in danger. I know it is weak and unmanly not to be able to resist; but people don't know what it means to try and try, and still go down."

The appeal stirred the Rev. Walter Bush, the preacher, and he pledged himself to help them in every possible manner. The interview ended with a plan to call a mass meeting to discuss the situation in the town, and to stir up sentiment.

When his visitors were gone, the preacher went over to talk with Dr. Harvey, the pastor of the sister denomination. Mr. Harvey greeted his visitor cordially, and took him into his study. Walter Bush told the story of the interview with Neal and his friends and the transactions at the saloon the night before.

"A very interesting account," said Mr. Harvey, dryly; but it will not amount to anything. That man Neal is not to be depended upon at all. It's just a passing wave of sentiment. They will all be drunk again in a day or two."

"They may, if we don't encourage them."

"It won't do any good. They never come to church, and are beyond the reach of salvation."

"They are more to be pitied than blamed."

"Oh, I don't know about that!"

"But if the temptation were out of their way, they would have a chance to get free."

"If you mean the saloon, it is a vain dream. This is a practical world and the saloon is part of it. I tell you, Bush, I used to talk against the saloon; but I've learned better. You only antagonize people and put them where you can't influence them."

"If you mean the saloonkeeper and his friends, that may be true; but how many such people have you got into the church since you stopped saying anything about the business?"

"Well, really I don't think of any; but their goodwill and financial support are of some value. Now, mind you, if it did any good to fight, I would fight; but it does not."

"How much financial support are the saloons contributing to the churches of this town? There isn't a dollar comes my way, and I don't want their money."

"Mr. Lee pays regularly to us," said the other, "and he helped on the debt. Of course, that makes no difference with me; but I believe in Paul's injunction to be all things to all men in order to save some. I compromise with conditions just as far as I can conscientiously. It is so much better to have evil men your friends than your enemies."

For answer, Bush told of the contemplated mass meeting and the projected movement to vote the saloon license away, and asked his brother preacher if he would help.

"No good ever comes for such means," was the reply. "We are to save souls individually. This world is hopelessly lost, anyway; it is like butting your head against a stone wall to try to change institutions. The weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. Prayer is the mighty weapon, brother."

"Yes, prayer is mighty," rejoined Bush, "but a prayer to lessen the influence of the saloon is valueless, unless you answer it yourself by getting out of your shell and fighting."

"An idle dream, brother, an idle dream. Now, suppose you vote the saloon out. It will be in again in a year or two. "Your idea is all wrong. We are in this world, but not of it. My citizenship is in heaven," said Harvey solemnly.

"Why don't you take your baggage and move over there?" retorted Bush hotly. "I say it is the mission of the church to antagonize everything that is evil. As to salary, I can dig ditches for a living if I have to. There are some men whose opposition is better than their favor. But we are wandering from the issue. Will you help me in this movement?"

"Certainly, in every judicious way. But Lee runs a very respectable place."

"It is the worst place in town. Its very respectability is its danger!"

The mass meeting was called. The town hall was packed. The news of the strange doings in the Golden Rule Saloon had been noised abroad and curiosity was great. There were stirring speeches by prominent men. The most telling speech was made by Neal, who again told something of his life story, and pleaded for help.

Out of the meeting came a movement to vote the saloon out of business. The movement was so general and had such backing that Marvin became alarmed. At first he called it a passing excitement; but soon he saw that a fight was impending that really threatened his business. He went to Lee, and together they planned a campaign of resistance. Lee's business, too, was in jeopardy. His wrath had been stirred by the abuse publicly heaped on his head at the mass meeting, and, as usual when antagonized, he was ready for a stubborn resistance.

The saloons became the headquarters for the "wet" faction which met nightly to curse the church, and especially the preacher who had stirred up the trouble. Their favorite talk was that the town could not run without the license money, and that the saloon brought trade.

Marvin was a politician of no mean ability. He engineered a campaign that was stubbornly fought. The two saloonkeepers put up $5,000 between them. They carefully canvassed the town, and used any persuasion that would work. A check for $50 found its way somehow into the hands of Mr. Harvey. Needless to say, he lost his zeal for the cause before election. He still worked with Bush in a public way, but what little spirit he had vanished. Provisions were sent to poor people who were doubtful in their attitude to the reform movement. Threats and intimidation were used in some cases. Every possible "wet" vote was registered, and it was found that the election would be close. Marvin felt sure that they would win. He knew all the tricks. The other faction was not as wise and methodical in its work. They depended too much on the righteousness of their cause, and on public enthusiasm and speeches. They worked hard, however, and did much personal canvassing, making up in zeal what they lacked in system.

Election day dawned. Marvin was ready to lead the final battle. They began early to get their voters in. He had several little schemes in mind which he thought to spring at the right hour.

The opposition forces were led by a strong committee. Bush and Neal were the most persistent workers, and were on hand at an early hour. They seemed tireless in their zeal. The blacksmith talked like one familiar with the whole question. When some one insisted that the license money was necessary to run the town, he fired up in a flash.

"In the first place," he said, the saloon adds to taxation instead of lessening it, as any man knows who uses his brains to think. Take it the country over, the cost of keeping up the jails and prisons, of criminal trials, and the salaries of officers is ten times what the saloon pays. It means that you spend ten dollars in order to get one. Take it in this county: This last year we had Hood's murder trial that cost the taxpayers $8,000. Now, the part of that which the taxpayers of this village have to pay is away up in the hundreds. And that is only part of the expenses. But a man is not a patriot who puts this question as a mere matter of dollars. The question is, is the saloon right? The courts have said that legally a man has no inherent right to keep a saloon as he has to run a grocery. And, men, you and I know it is not right to corrupt politics as Lee and Marvin are doing today. They are buying votes and I know it. And it is not right to ruin the individual and so ruin the home and the nation. We are traitors to the principles of American liberty when we vote for a saloon. It is against everything that is good."

Marvin, too, was active, and he kept a number of henchmen busy all day. Some people were paid liberally not to go to the polls. Mary Jones did the most telling work for Marvin. Her husband was a drunkard who had neglected his family for years. She had suffered enough to work on the right side. The store had granted her credit whenever she had needed it. This had often kept her from actual suffering. She took in washing for a living while her husband loafed at Marvin's Place.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Is Mars Inhabited?*

I HAVE read lately of certain observations that have been made of the planet Mars, and deductions that have been made therefrom that the planet is likely to be inhabited. It is held that there are certain conditions in that world capable of sustaining life, and that therefore life exists there.

But I would say that such an argument is by no means conclusive. We believe that many or all of the planets are inhabited; but the belief is not founded on any special suitableness for habitation that can be observed. Instead of that, we have the strong argument of analogy, coupled with divine wisdom and goodness. Several of the planets are so much larger and more magnificent than the earth, and they so manifestly belong to the same family, in that they circle around the sun like the earth, and have an atmosphere like the earth, and are lighted like the earth, and in so many ways are like the earth, that it would be most unreasonable to believe that they are barren wastes, while the earth teems with population. Think, also, that the Creator seems to delight in sentient enjoyment, and then think of the many and vast opportunities he has made for himself of dispensing happiness, and it would not be easy to believe that he has neglected such opportunities. This argument from analogy, and the known character of the Creator, seems to me far stronger than any argument derived from a very limited observation. At the same time we must remember that all the planets, like the earth, require a long time to cool, so that some of them may not be inhabited at the present moment.

We have to remember, too, that the conditions that prevail here may, or may not, be repeated in other worlds. These may be as diverse as possible. When we see how that in this world some animals can live in the air and others in the water, we may be prepared for the most diverse form of life elsewhere. Evidently the Creator delights in variety; so there is likely the utmost variety of life throughout universal nature.

A Castle in Poland †

THE castle is, or was, a practically square structure perched on an elevation with a wide moat about it, and flanked by towers at the corners of the walls, each, perhaps, fifty feet high. The building itself was two stories in height, and constructed of stone and brick, with stucco on the outside. It is surmounted by a ridge-pole roof, fashioned of rough, wooden joists bound together with rope and covered with cement. The great keep still yawns to the left of the main hall, and remains of secret passages may be seen at every possible point. Surrounding the court yard, under the walls, and looking out through cannon holes on the moat, were the officers' quarters. At one corner of the wall, where the turf slopes rather abruptly down to the moat, there is a narrow ridge, along which the Turks are said to have attempted to enter on the night of the great storm.

Off to the west, near where the manor-house stands to-day, are the remains of the bastion or fort, the point at which Skrzetuski climbed down on his perilous mission to the king. Podbipienta had failed, and the gallant Skrzetuski volunteered to carry the message telling of Zbaraz's dire need. At the time there was a great pond or staw, which extended up to the very wall. At the present time this has shrunk, so that it is but a widening of the little stream that runs through it, but so lazily that the pond is mostly stagnant water. With a good road, a row of huts, and altogether fully one hundred feet of dry earth between the foot of the wall and the pond, I found it an arduous and even perilous undertaking to clamber down the steep stone wall. The marsh looks inhospitable enough to-day, when there are no corpses floating about in it—at least, no human corpses—and no enemy worse than a mosquito on watch for the unwary. Skrzetuski's heroism can only be fully appreciated when one sees the spot, knows somewhat of the characteristics of the age, and then reads the novelist's vivid description. Sienkiewicz says that the wall was not completed on the side of the ponds at the time of the siege, and it was here that Burlai, the old Cossack commander, almost succeeded in forcing an entrance. The Hungarians were yielding when the stout German mercenaries came up and saved the day. In the darkness the besieged began to throw lighted tar down from the walls, that the repulse might be complete. One could almost fancy that he saw Zagloba before him, trembling as he recognized the terrible Burlai, the warrior who had just killed his tenth man.

The day was drawing to a close as I took my last look from the battlements of Zbaraz—a beautiful, clear July evening. To the west, the country stretched off to Russia, wave upon wave of ripened grain, amid which gleamed and nodded in the breeze hundreds of scarlet poppies, like the red dragoons of Wolodyjowski, bending for a charge. Everything was quiet, peaceful, beautiful. And then, as on that other July day, night fell and vespers began to toll.

†Poland, the Knight Among Nations, by Louis C. Van Norman, gives a most graphic account of life in the Poland of to-day, as well as vivid glimpses of her historic past. Poland for generations was the Christian bulwark against which broke many waves of barbarian invasion. It is of those heroic days that Sienkiewicz wrote in his famous stories of Fire and Sword and The Knights of the Cross. Many of the places mentioned in these are described by Mr. Van Norman. The book will be of especial interest to Americans on account of the large number of Poles now coming to this country. Cloth cover; 359 pages. Illustrated. Price $1.50. Fleming H. Also Have Things to Learn.

"For many years I have used coffee and refused to be convinced of its bad effect upon the human system," writes a veteran school teacher.

"Ten years ago I was obliged to give up my much loved work in the public schools after years of continuous labor. I had developed a well defined case of chronic coffee poisoning.

"The troubles were constipation, flutterings of the heart, a thumping in the top of my head and various parts of my body, twitching of my limbs, shaking of my head and, at times after exertion, a general "gone" feeling with a toper's desire for very strong coffee. I was a nervous wreck for years.

"A short time ago friends came to visit us and they brought a package of Postum with them, and urged me to try it. I was prejudiced because some years ago I had drunk a cup of weak, tasteless stuff called Postum which I did not like at all.

"This time, however, my friend made the Postum according to directions on the package, and it won me. Suddenly I found myself improving in a most decided fashion.

"The odor of boiling coffee no longer tempts me. I am so greatly benefited by Postum that if I continue to improve as I am now, I'll begin to think I have found the Fountain of Perpetual Youth. This is no fancy letter but stubborn facts which I am glad to make known."

Unseen Comfort

A. O. Leonard INVENTOR LEONARD'S ANTISEPTIC EAR DRUM

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. I have just gotten out a new Ear Drum that is a great improvement over my original Drum. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

Samson's Wonderful Feats

By Mrs. M. Baxter

ALL strength comes from God; whether physical strength, as in the case of Samson; military strength, as in Gideon's case; or spiritual strength in the conquest of temptation, in the endurance of trial, and in the carrying out of work for God, as in the case of the apostle Paul. "Ascribe ye strength unto God," says David. In this confidence, he alone, of all Israel, though at the time a mere stripling, volunteered to meet the giant champion of the Philistines. "Sing aloud unto God our strength," became one of the songs of Israel.

We are about to consider something of the history of Samson, the strongest man that ever lived, not because he was muscularly more developed than another, for when the Lord departed from him he was as weak as any other man; but because he was a man who by faith took in and exercised the strength of God. Before his birth, the children of Israel had done "evil again in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord delivered them into the hands of the Philistines forty years." But, oh, how true it is of our God, that in wrath he remembers mercy! While the bondage was becoming continually more severe, the deliverer who was destined to rescue the nation was being prepared.

Just about the beginning of the time when the Philistines ruled over them, the angel of the Lord appeared to the wife of Manoah, of the family of Dan, and told her she should bear a son, though it was contrary to all human probability. The angel warned her to drink no wine nor strong drink, for her son should be a Nazarite unto God; and he said, "He shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines." It is very evident that Manoah and his wife were believers, and in the habit of communing with God. This appears from their conversation together after the angel had appeared unto the woman. Probably they had grieved over the idolatry of their country, and had cried to God to send deliverance. Manoah entreated the Lord for a repetition of the vision, that he and his wife might be further instructed.

Would to God that every one who gets a message from him, either through the reading of his Word, in converse with other Christians, or any other way, would always commune with the Lord about it! Too often do the steps which we gain in light fail to become steps in life and experience, simply because we rest in the light, instead of carrying it to God, that he may turn light into life, knowledge into experience. The Lord granted Manoah's request, and repeated his injunctions. Manoah's wife seems to have had more spiritual perception than her husband; she saw the angel's face "like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible." Manoah, still regarding the heavenly visitor as a mere man, asked his name, and "knew not that he was an angel of the Lord."

The angel refused to eat of Manoah's bread, but consented that he should offer a burnt-offering unto the Lord, and when the angel ascended in the flame of the altar, Manoah's conclusion was: "We shall surely die, because we have seen God. But his wife said unto him, If the Lord were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat offering at our hands, neither would he have showed us all these things, nor would as at this time have told us such things as these." Well may we believe that this mother was much in communion with God about her boy, and that his strong faith in God was nurtured in his early home. We are told of his boy-life. "The child grew, and the Lord blessed him. And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol."

God always meets faith, in whatsoever manner it is exercised by his children. Had Samson trusted God for moral strength as he did for physical, his history would have been very different; we should not have seen him overcome by a wicked woman's tears, while at the same time, he was irresistible in strength to the Philistine enemies of his country.

A Boy's Persistence

AMONG the students graduated from the Central College of Colombo in Ceylon, is a young man who has had a wonderful career. His acquaintance with Mr. S. C. K. Rutnam, the principal of the college, began some years ago. He presented himself unannounced one morning while Mr. Rutnam was at breakfast and begged for food and shelter. He said he had come from Madras in the hope of finding work. He had been several days in Colombo tramping the streets vainly seeking employment and sleeping at night in the public park. Mr. Rutnam relieved his immediate necessities, but, as he explained to him, was himself too poor to keep him permanently. But the lad was eager to work, and besides, was anxious to learn, and he had heard that in the Central College an education might be obtained.

Mr. Rutnam had to go to the college at eight o'clock, so he left the boy there. At night, when he returned, he found that the newcomer was still there, but he had not been idle. He had swept the compound (courtyard) and had put the garden in thorough order. He had well earned a supper and a night's lodging, so he was kept till morning. The next day, work was found for him in the college grounds, and this, too, he did well. Finally an arrangement was made for him to remain, doing odd work about home and garden and college and studying part of the day. So earnest and industrious was the lad, that he made as much progress as the boys who studied all day. He was soon able to exchange his chores for teaching the junior classes and made still further progress with his studies. He became a Christian and took an active part in the religious work of the college.

Since his graduation he has returned to Madras, where he has obtained a clerkship in the post-office, from which, just before Mr. Rutnam left for New York, he was promoted to a still higher post under government. Opportunities for such service as that Mr. Rutnam rendered to this poor boy are continually occurring, and if he succeeds in obtaining the help he has come to America to obtain, a fine sphere of beneficent service is open to him. Hitherto his work has been curtailed by lack of funds. Any contributions our readers may send to us for him will be forwarded.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Reader, Ohio. "I promised to acknowledge it to the world if my prayer was answered. It was, and I thank God for all his goodness."

Reader, New Jersey. "I wish to add my testimony to answered prayers. Recently I was in very great perplexity. I went to God in prayer. He heard and answered. I promised that I would acknowledge it to the world."

One of God's Children, Illinois. "I wish to add my testimony that God does hear and answer prayer. Many times he has heard and answered my prayers. Once when I was in great distress, he heard and answered and gave me a greater blessing than I ever could have hoped to receive."

Reader, Michigan. "I wish to add my testimony that the Lord is a hearer of prayer. He has granted my petition. His name be praised."

Constant Reader, South Carolina. "I asked the Lord to deliver me from a great trial. He answered my prayer and made it right. Praise his holy name!"

Grateful Heart, Ohio. "Acknowledgment is made of the answering of a special prayer several months ago, for the saving of a Christian mother's life, when physicians declared she could not survive the night. The Lord has answered many other prayers for me and I thank him for his goodness."

UNIVERSITY of CHICAGO

The W. C. T. U. Convention

THE Thirty-fourth Annual Convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New York State was held in the First M. E. Church, Rochester, N. Y., October 11 to 15, inclusive. The first morning, after devotional exercises, the presidents of the counties were called to the platform to tell the most important things that had been accomplished by their counties during the year. The president's address was listened to with great interest and the recommendations received with favor. There were 458 delegates and a large number of visitors. At the evening session the church was crowded. The superintendent's reports were very gratifying, showing much faithful and good work done by the various departments of the Society. The membership of New York State W. C. T. U. now is 26,548, an increase over last year of 325. Mrs. Frances W. Graham was re-elected president. Mrs. Frank J. Shuler, president Western New York Federation of Women's Clubs, gave an interesting address on "The Greatest Need of the American Women of To-day." Miss Rose Johnson, of New York City, who has recently returned from Panama after one year of mission work on the isthmus, told of the bad conditions existing there, and gave a pathetic account of the ravages which drink, gambling and dens of vice have made on the young men of this country who are working on the canal. She told tales which were full of heartache and misery, of American girls drugged in New York City and taken aboard ship and carried to the isthmus.

Mrs. Ella A. Brole, Ph.D., of Brooklyn, former president of New York State W. C. T. U., spoke on Mormonism and immigration. Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, of Washington, D. C., national superintendent of legislative work, gave an interesting address upon "Congressional Glimpses." Brigadier-General A. T. Daggett, of Herpeswell, Me., gave an address against the army canteen.

Among the resolutions was one denouncing the seating of Reed Smoot in the United States Senate as "an entering wedge for the great Mormon Church into the affairs of our government," and urging effort to secure an anti-polygamy amendment to the Constitution. Another resolution opposes the re-establishment of the canteen.

Thanksgiving Time*

AMONG the reminiscences of the first Napoleon by his friend and secretary Bourienne is an interesting illustration of gratitude. It appears that a large garden party was held at the Tuileries, and after greeting his guests, Napoleon disguised himself and strolled about the gardens with Bourienne. He was much interested in a boy who was going around shouting, "Long live the Emperor." "Why do you want the Emperor to live long?" Napoleon asked the youngster. "Because he is a good man," was the reply, "and has been kind to my father." Napoleon inquired who his father was, and learned that there had been no special act of kindness. The man had been promoted for good service. But Napoleon was so interested in him that he made investigation and gave him higher promotion.

A poor and aged man was observed planting and grafting apple-trees in his orchard. "Why do you give yourself so much trouble?" he was asked. "You will not be alive to eat the fruit of these trees." The old man answered as he leaned on his spade: "I have eaten the fruit of trees that some one planted before me. I do not know who did it, but I show my gratitude by planting trees for posterity. Some one will eat the fruit of them and be thankful."

Archbishop Trench used to say that there were some men who would murmur if one speck of darkness appeared in their bright sky; while there were others who were full of thankfulness if but one ray of brightness shot through the darkness of their gloomy lot.

An historian of the early colonial days describes a meeting that was called in those days of hardship and privation, to appoint a day of fasting and prayer. After several had spoken, a plain colonist arose and apologizing for speaking in the presence of the governor and the clergy, said he thought they had heard enough of their trials and troubles, and that it was high time to consider their mercies. The colony was growing strong, the promise of a bountiful harvest was good, the rivers were full of fish and the woods of game, the air was sweet and exhilarating, and above all they were in full enjoyment of religious liberty, the blessing they had come so far to seek. He would therefore move as an amendment that the day to be set apart should be one of Thanksgiving.

Self-Mastery*

IMAGINATION almost fails to conceive what would be the condition of a country in which the lowest, most ignorant and depraved of the population composed the legislature, sat on the judge's bench and held the municipal offices. That is the condition of anarchy existing in the being who is controlled by his appetites and passions. There is peace in the soul when those bad rulers are obeyed, until ruin comes, or the man by some appeal is startled into a realization of his state; but no sooner do conscience and reason raise their heads than there is war. The powers that have usurped the throne of the soul assert their claims, and refuse to be dethroned. Then if the good persists, the man is torn by such a struggle as Paul describes (Rom. 7: 14-20), in which he does that he would not, and knowing the right, does the wrong.

The state of the drunkard resolved to cease drinking to excess, yet turning into the saloon for another debauch, is an extreme case. There are other vices besides drunkenness that exert similar power. The gambler declares that his slavery is more inexorable than that of the drunkard and the paralysis of his better nature more complete. Recent events, published broadcast, show that the libertine is no better and that he will desert wife and children and give up honor under the power of the spell. The passion for power and fame and the thirst for money also belong, with many others, to this category. Any passion that masters us, that holds control and urges us to disregard conscience, is an insurgent of the mind, a usurper to be resisted and overcome.

The conflict has been recognized in all ages. Every generation has seen and sorrowed over the victims. Samson, David and Solomon in Biblical times are conspicuous examples of the wrecks of modern times. Those three show that neither physical strength, military and poetic genius, nor wisdom itself will render a man immune. Allied to the beasts on the one hand, and having the nature of God himself on the other, man is required to decide for himself which shall rule. It is when he realizes the situation and ardently desires to overcome, that man finds in his utter weakness a helping hand stretched out to him. God knows and sympathizes. He is interested in the struggle. He offers his strength in unlimited degree.

I Will Give Away 289 Sample Outfits Beautiful Imitation Cut Glass

Now suppose I called at your home and told you that I had a plan by which you could get some of the finest imitation Cut Glass ever made without it costing you any money, you would listen to me, wouldn't you?

Well, then, you should read every word of this advertisement, for I am going to tell you here just what I have to offer, and I know you will want it.

If I could call at your home I would say to you, "Madam, here is a handsome Berry Set—large and heavy 8-inch Bowl and twelve 4½-inch Berry or Sauce Dishes that I will give you if you will do a little work for me."

I would hand you the Bowl and I know you would be delighted with it. It is so heavy that you would come near dropping it when I let go of it and its unexpected weight was left in your hands.

You would admire the Berry Set. Then I would say, "Well, that Berry Set is not all that I am going to give you. Here is a lovely Water Set—Pitcher and Six Glasses that I am going to give you in addition to the Berry Set." The Pitcher is a large one, standing more than eight inches high and holding ½ gallon. The tumblers match the beautiful pattern, of course.

Then I would say, "But still that is not all. I will give you, too, this fine imitation Cut Glass Table Set, consisting of Covered Sugar Bowl and Creamer, Covered Butter Dish and Spoon Holder."

If I had set out all these beautiful pieces on your table they would make a splendid array, but there would still be another surprise awaiting you, for my proposition to you would not yet be finished.

I would add to the Berry Set, Water Set and Table Set a 5½-inch tall Footed Jelly Dish, a 6-oz. Cruet for Olive Oil or Vinegar, a Toothpick Holder, an 8-inch Olive Dish for pickles or celery, and a nice Handled Olive or Bonbon Dish.

Now, this whole assortment of 31 pieces is just as I have enumerated it here. It is made by a new process which perfectly imitates the genuine Cut Glass pattern in all its beauty and brightness. Its color is as pure as crystal. Altogether it is a magnificent array of table glassware—one that you will be proud to own.

These sample assortments were made for the use of salesmen and for exhibition at fairs, expositions, etc., but unexpected circumstances caused that plan to be changed, and now I am going to give them away for advertising purposes.

I am going to give them away to ladies who will help me. You can have one. You need send no money. My new plan will put you in a position where you can have not only this beautiful assortment of glassware for your own home, but you can give fine large single pieces of this beautiful imitation Cut Glass to a number of your friends.

I cannot spend much money for advertising this new plan, so I cannot tell you all about it here, but I will be glad to send you complete and full information if you will write to me for it. Send no money. Just say, "Tell me how I can get a Sample Assortment of Imitation Cut Glass free."

How Delaware's Women Won

THE women of Delaware were almost a unit in favor of Prohibition in the recent exciting political campaign in that State. In consequence of their persistent fight, two important counties have gone

A House-to-House Canvass

"dry," and the saloons in these two centres will have to close.

During the fight, the cities blossomed out into "banner towns." Each side seemed to be persuaded that by banners, buttons and badges reform could be won. On one of the churches appeared this sign:

The nation is founded on Manhood and Womanhood—The Saloon is built on the wrecks of both.

The reply to this gambit of the women was the following flung to the breeze by the saloonkeepers:

Boys who want to drink can't get it in this saloon—They will have to wait for the Prohibition Speak easy.

To this defiance the women came forward with a banner that was flung across the leading street. On it appeared this:

A stainless flag—A saloonless State.

This was followed up by a bill-posters' crusade, the following being posted up on all the dead walls of the town:

Saloons cannot run without boys—Have you one to spare? Think it over.

Governor Hoch of Kansas was called into the campaign, the following sentiment of his being posted up:

The saloon imposes more burdens of taxation upon the people than any other agency in existence.

Then came the buttons. These were distributed broadcast bearing the following appeal: "Vote against for my sake." In the centre of this button appears the picture of a pretty little girl. Thousands of these were distributed among the negro population before it dawned on some one that a negro wearing this badge was making a joke of the fight. So the badges were recalled from the negro quarter, and one bearing the picture of a colored child given out in its place.

Besides distributing badges and putting up banners, the women conducted a house-to-house canvass, imploring the voters to come out flat-footed in opposition to the saloons. Well-known temperance advocates assisted in the campaign and every church in town was up in arms for the "dry" issue.

"The Apostle of the Philippines"

EVANGELIST NICOLO ZAMORA, whose spiritual labors in the Philippines are well known to many of our readers, who have contributed to the support of his work, has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a report reviewing the results of the past year's effort in Manila and vicinity. He writes:

"In the Tondo district, I have preached every Sunday morning at the Rizal Theatre, and in the evenings at the different chapels. For three months and a half these meetings continued nightly until the beginning of the rainy season. The Tondo district has eleven chapels, and in each chapel there are two meetings weekly, consequently there are twenty-two meetings weekly on the circuit. The chapels at Santa Monica and Bilbao were destroyed in the great windstorms, and their people transferred to other congregations.

"One of the chief troubles this year has been with the Catotohanan, a society within the church that was really working against it. They attempted to separate from the church and take many members with them, but they were unable to effect anything, and in the end the society was broken up.

"At the Rizal Theatre meetings, there are four hundred or more attendants each Sunday, and on all special occasions there is almost double this number. There are many teaching spiritualism in my field; but I have been able by the grace of God to withstand it in such a way that we have not lost members. It has also been necessary to fight the vices to which some still cling, and which they were accustomed to in the Roman Church.

"The Sunday School at Tondo is well organized and has a very large attendance.

"There are at present 588 church members in full connection, 102 on probation, with 800 adherents. I have baptized 221 adults and 73 children during the year."

Evangelist Zamora has had the most difficult field of any man on the district. He has shown courage, grace, good sense, kindness, wisdom and fitness for the ministry. He has preached almost incessantly during the year, and under his care the church has been greatly strengthened and its membership increased.

Called Higher

Mrs. Elizabeth J., wife of James R. Davis, departed this life on July 19, in Danville, Pa., aged sixty-four years. Mrs. Davis came to America from South Wales in 1881, transferring her membership from the Welsh Episcopal Church, of which she became a devoted member at the age of thirteen years. She was a useful worker in the church to which she came and always had THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in her home.

Van Camp's PORK AND BEANS

BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

The Name on the Can and the Woman Who Knows

The housewife of experience and discernment can't be induced to accept a substitute for Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce, because she knows—

Knows Van Camp's have the highest Quality within the range of the possible—a delicate deliciousness, which once tasted, is never forgotten — nutritive powers which place Van Camp's among the most healthful of foods.

She insists that the name on the can must be Van Camp's.—Because—she knows that Van Camp's stands for Best.—

And she has sound, substantial reasons behind her knowledge.

For Van Camp's experience and skill make Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce so irresistibly good—so richly nutritious—that the brand to use is not a matter of selection, but a matter of course—Van Camp's.

These are the Van Camp beans—the best grade of the best varieties raised in the best bean-growing sections of the country, plump, snowy, nutty-flavored beans, cooked in the famous Van Camp way.

Then with the beans goes just the right proportion of tomato sauce, so piquantly delicious that it makes you hungry to think about it—and a spicy slice of the juiciest, tenderest pork you ever ate, to give exactly the right degree of appetizing richness.

All that, and more, is what the name of Van Camp on the can means to the woman who knows.

If you don't know, it's because you never in your life tasted Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce.

Order a can from your grocer right away, and then you will know.

And never again will you be without at least six cans of Van Camp's on the pantry shelf.

IN A CENTRAL AFRICAN PARADISE

Its Strange Tribes and Hospitable Monarchs—A Land of Lions and Monkeys

IN these days of far-reaching travel and exploration, the world is revising its opinions concerning many things. It is only a few years since Africa was popularly known as the "Dark Continent," but it is so no longer. Missionaries, scientists and travelers have penetrated its farthest recesses, and now the railroad is reaching out into what was formerly regarded as a wilderness full of dangers and privations, and peopled only by savage tribes and wild beasts. That it was so a generation ago, was doubtless true of certain parts of Africa; but little was known of that land as a whole, and the misconceptions concerning it were many.

Among THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S missionary correspondents are not a few who have the gift of charming description, and who send in their letters most attractive pictures of lands hitherto practically unknown. One of these correspondents, Mrs. R. Wodehouse, of the new Umtali Mission in Matabeleland, in her journal of a tour through Central African scenes, untraveled till now by white men or women, gives us some delightful glimpses of the primitive native life, and the magnificent natural panorama. The latter was a continual surprise and inspiration to the travelers. They proceeded slowly, by easy stages, attended by native helpers, and tenting at night on the plain, in the forest, or by the bank of some stream, with little thought of danger. Mrs. Wodehouse writes:

"We passed through forest paths where many strange trees grew. The euphorbias grow very large here, and every now and then we would pass a baobab that looked like a grim old giant among the other trees. We were now in the country of beautiful palms, with tall straight trunks and feathery tops; the foliage had become quite tropical.

"We reached the Inyatzi River at 3 P.M., and pitched our tents to remain over Sunday. It was a beautiful place where we camped, in the shade of a large tree, the river running close behind our tents, and the thick tropical foliage reaching down to the water's edge. All nature seemed luxurious here, and the air was vocal with the songs of birds, the cooing of doves and the buzzing of insects.

"Next morning Mr. Greeley and some of our native workers went to hold service in some of the neighboring kraals. In the afternoon we went to see a group of magnificent palms, with branches of fruit hanging in thick clusters. There are many beautiful birds here. On the way back to our tents we saw a lovely little paroquet, green and blue.

"Next day at noon we reached a kraal, where we had a cup of tea and a little refreshment. The natives as we get farther down look much wilder and are more sparsely clothed. The women in the kraal near where we had our meal wore scarcely any clothing and had their hair twisted in corkscrews, with fat and string. About four in the afternoon, the beautiful waters of the Sabi River were to be seen glinting through the trees in the narrow path by which our way led. Shortly after we reached our camping place and pitched our tents under a huge musha tree, whose branches reached to the ground. Under this immense tree were our two tents, the two donkeys and all our native boys. It was like an immense canopy. We were close to a kraal, where the people are having a carousal, drinking native liquor and making an unearthly noise. They did not continue their orgies very late, however, so that we had a restful night. While we slept a leopard was close to our encampment. His footprints were seen in the morning, just outside. The fires which we had burning all night kept him from coming among us.

"After breakfast we visited the kraal. There is one native house which is quite ornamental. It consists of two rooms and has a verandah, and it is ornamented in pattern with reeds and has two doors and imitation windows. We went inside and found it beautifully clean. There were several contrivances for holding sticks, blankets and sundry belongings, quite in advance of the usual native hut, and showing the possibility of these people for improvement. They are not without the artistic element in their natures.

"In another part of the kraal we watched a woman making pottery. It was wonderful to see how cleverly she formed the pots with clay wet with water. When formed they are smoothed over with a flat stick; then they are put into the fire to dry and harden, and they make very nice pots indeed in which they cook their food. These people do indeed live the simple life. Toward night, Mr. Wodehouse took his gun to try to shoot some fresh meat, and came back with a pheasant and a partridge. We had service with the natives in the evening, some from the kraal attending. Mr. Wodehouse asked me to speak. I thought while I was speaking that probably some that came from the kraal had never heard the story of Jesus before. What a privilege it is to be free to tell these benighted heathen of the love of God through Jesus Christ."

Proceeding in her story of the journey, which occupied two months, Mrs. Wodehouse relates many strange experiences among the various tribes, most of whose people were amazed at the sight of a white woman. At nearly every kraal they entered, the curious

DAUGHTERS OF MERCY IN GERMANY

THERE are about 15,000 deaconesses laboring as Daughters of Mercy in 1,500 hospitals and benevolent institutions in Germany. These dry figures, however, set one thinking, and I am sure all Christians will praise God for this noble work of Protestant women for the sick and sorrowing, the poor and vicious and unfortunate women of the fatherland. Nursing the sick in hospitals and homes is the distinctive work of these trained nurses, but all work must be done in the spirit of the compassionate Saviour of men.

Sister Anna and Her Staff in the Diakonissenheim, Cassel

Jew and Gentile alike are cared for and no questions are asked as to caste or creed; the only condition is one of suffering and need, and the helping hand is extended gladly to all in distress. Germany's Daughters of Mercy are a factor in her national life, and every man will protect and help them at all times and in every place. If a lone woman is out late at night she is in danger; but a deaconess who may happen to be out on the street after midnight is known by her plain garb and is free from all danger.

In the year 1779, the Christ-hearted servant of the model pastor Oberlin, Louise Scheppeler, organized the first Protestant school for little children in Steinthal, and this work has grown to be a great branch of deaconess work. In the frequent wars, Christian nurses as deaconesses came to the front to care for the wounded and dying. During an epidemic of cholera in 1831, Amalie Sieveking first entered a hospital to give Christian nursing to the sick. At first, many good people looked upon this as sentimentality, but the hospital doctors knew the value of the touch of a woman's hand, and all prejudice was soon removed. Now the work is thoroughly organized, and the man chosen of God to benefit human sufferers by this organized work of Christian love was Theodore Fliedner, and Kaiserswerth became the birthplace of the organization. Among the Mennonites in Holland, Fliedner learned to know the work of the deaconesses, and among the Quakers in England, from that saintly woman, Elizabeth Fry, he received his inspiration for work among fallen women and the care of women in prison. On September 17, 1833, the first dismissed female prisoner entered the good pastor's home in Kaiserswerth, and on October 13, 1836, the first deaconess. After the lapse of only a few years, Fliedner sent Daughters of Mercy from Kaiserswerth into all parts of the world. Now this number has grown until 15,000 are working in all the large cities of Europe, and many thousands of sufferers have been saved bodily and spiritually.

There is a delightful spirit of Christian union manifested among the sisters. While there has been, alas, much misunderstanding among the churches of Germany about dogmas and creeds, the sisters have let all these questions be side issues, while they labored unitedly to bring Christ to the sufferers. Connected with the Lutheran, Reformed, Baptist, Methodist, Evangelical, Mennonite and other churches are organizations of deaconesses, and these have their organized central unions, and meet together for mutual counsel and encouragement.

Just let me give a short sketch of one of these organizations. Just twenty years ago the Rev. Ed. Scheve of Berlin organized a little home for deaconesses in a room six feet wide and twelve feet long. A sister came to him and said God had sent her to tell him to begin this work. Soon another sister was added. Now there are about one hundred connected with the Home for Deaconesses, "Bethel" in Berlin. Although the sisters nurse many cases of contagious disease, yet very few of them have died.

Pastor Scheve, the Founder

With him are African princes and princesses now in training at the Home

One of these Daughters of Mercy has charge of the ward in the municipal hospital of Linden, where the very dregs of humanity are received, and many have contagious diseases. Sister Hanna is very happy in caring for this family of sin and sorrow. One day a little infant of two years was brought to her. The little one had lost its mother, and the brutal drunken father kept the child locked up in a garret where there was nothing to cheer and warm it, and where it spent its dreary life in solitude, cold and hunger. The child could only moan; disease had deformed its little body. Sister Hanna became a veritable mother to the waif, and careful nursing has made little Sophie a happy child.

Sophie is dressed now in the garb of the sisters, and she tells all proudly: "I am Sister Sophie; my mother's name is Sister Hanna. I am now four years old, and oh, I do love to sing!"

Millions in Germany and in all parts of the world bless these Daughters of Mercy. They illustrate as no other organization the beautiful truths Olive Schreiner has enunciated: "Holiness is infinite compassion for others; greatness is to take the little things of life and walk truly among them; happiness is a great love and much serving!"

HOW OKLAHOMA WAS WON

By EDWIN C. DINWIDDIE, Chairman Joint Campaign Committee

ON September 17 last, the voters of the new State of Oklahoma, representative of nearly a million and a half of people, voted in favor of state-wide Prohibition by a majority of almost 20,000. This was accomplished after a most strenuous campaign; first, in the fall of 1906, for the election of delegates to the Constitutional Convention; second, in the Constitutional Convention, from November to April, and, third, in the more recent campaign for the adoption of the Constitution and the Prohibition provision.

The first effort was successful in that, while Prohibition was not incorporated in the body of the Constitution, one of the most complete and stringent articles on that subject was submitted separately to the people, simultaneously with the Constitution, and upon the most favorable terms for the Prohibitionists. The results of the campaign could scarcely have been more favorable to them.

Indian Territory gave a majority for Prohibition, which thus endorsed the action of Congress in requiring, in the enabling act, the continuance of Prohibition in Indian Territory and the Indian reservations in Oklahoma. As the people of Oklahoma Territory gave a majority five times as great, Indian Territory cannot be said to have forced Prohibition on Oklahoma.

A very gratifying outcome was the vote in the cities. Every considerable city in Indian Territory was carried for Prohibition, and only one of the more populous cities of the Oklahoma side was lost to Prohibition by a large majority; so the country cannot be said to have forced Prohibition on the cities.

Up to within a month of the close of the campaign, we had conducted it so as to keep our expenditures within our resources. The exigencies of the campaign, however, required the expenditure of large sums for the maintenance of speakers in the field, and for the printing and distribution of immense quantities of literature. Over forty of the very best men and women available for the campaign were constantly engaged during the last five or six weeks before election, and about 15,000,000 pages of literature were distributed during the last thirty days of the campaign. This work undoubtedly turned the tide and saved the day for our cause in Indian Territory, where the enemy had been particularly active and had spent a large part of their efforts with both literature and personal workers, they having a campaign fund over ten times larger than ours. To meet these demands of the campaign we were required to incur about $2,500 additional expense beyond our resources, and, as we have a most important work ahead in the way of securing the proper enforcement of the law, every consideration demands that we do not attempt to go forward under the burden of such a debt. It will be a serious handicap not to have these obligations quickly discharged and the whole attention and resources of our temperance friends in Oklahoma should be directed toward making the policy of Prohibition in the new State thoroughly successful.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by its appeal last year, helped materially in the earlier stages of the campaign. We cannot exaggerate our appreciation of its help and the assistance rendered by its splendid constituency. The Methodist Temperance Society, the United Presbyterian Committee and churches, the General Synod Evangelical Lutheran Committee, the International Order of Good Templars, the National Anti-Saloon League and others all rendered our Joint Committee special financial help.

We ask for liberal contributions from temperance and humanitarian friends throughout the country. Their gifts for Oklahoma's success will return to them in their own States by and by.

Just four days before the election we received at headquarters the following letter from a poor woman in a city not fifty miles away from our State headquarters, in regard to her unpaid campaign subscription of one dollar:

"————, Sept. 12, 1907.

"Mr. Dinwiddie; Dear Sir: You may think I have been deceiving you, but I have not. My boy that gives me all of my support has been drinking for three weeks, and it is impossible for me to give you any money at all. I have to send you this in doing my duty, but our God knows I would of gladly helped the temperance cause any way I could.

Yours in Christ,

— — ————."

Do not you want to be one to take her place? Is not our Oklahoma victory a cause for national thanksgiving? Your contributions to the Oklahoma Fund may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Let us all give thanks for the splendid victory for civic righteousness and over the great enemy of the Kingdom in Oklahoma!

THE TRANSFORMATION AT ANNAPOLIS

Changes Which Give Us the Largest and Finest Naval Training School in the World

WHEN the new buildings, now in course of construction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, are completed, the famous institution which has produced so many gallant heroes will be architecturally the finest naval training college in the world.

Congress is expending $10,000,000 on the new buildings, which are arranged in three groups. The main entrance to the Academy grounds is on the side opposite the Severn River, and on this side are the chapel, the superintendent's residence and the Administration Building, with a long line of officers' quarters forming a supplementary group. To the right of the campus is Bancroft Hall, the new midshipmen's quarters, a vast structure with colonnades at either end, connecting it on the one side with the armory and on the other with the gymnasium. Across the campus is a third group of edifices, including the Academic Building and one devoted to marine engineering. The whole construction is of granite, concrete and light colored brick.

Bancroft Hall, the New Headquarters for the Midshipmen at Annapolis

Probably the most typical structure in an architectural sense is the Monumental Chapel, which cost over $400,000. It is a memorial to our fallen naval heroes. The 210-foot dome can be seen from a considerable distance. Under the main floor of the chapel is a crypt with space for numerous tombs, where the nation's distinguished naval commanders may find their last resting place.

Bancroft Hall, the spacious and imposing new midshipmen's quarters, is more than one thousand feet in length. Near it, fronting the bay, stand the armory and the gymnasium, which are connected with Bancroft Hall by ornamental colonnades, so that the effect of the entire architectural trio is most impressive. Bancroft Hall, six stories in height, contains 750 suits of two rooms and a bath each, affording living quarters for 1,500 midshipmen. The mess hall or dining room will seat two thousand persons. The Hall cost $3,600,000. The gymnasium and armory are each 360 feet in length by 100 feet in width, and each has a great main hall, 75 feet in height.

Thirty acres of reclaimed land have been transformed into a parade ground and athletic field, and will be the scene of future contests of skill and endurance.

A fine structure on one side of the campus is the Academic Building, which cost $1,500,000, contains one hundred classrooms, and is one of the largest buildings in the country devoted to educational purposes. It is five stories in height, and is surmounted by a fine tower. Near it is the Marine Engineering building, 300 by 100 feet in size and two stories in height, and attached to the academic building by underground steps, with wide barges of glass, and an outlet which affords the best facilities for engineering work.

On a height overlooking the river, is the new Naval Hospital, constructed at a cost of $1,500,000. The barracks for the use of the battalion of the United States marines regularly stationed at the Naval Academy for guard duty, is of the Spanish Mission type of structure. The officers and faculty of the Academy are housed in Sampson Row, which consists of over a dozen new buildings that cost in the aggregate more than $400,000; each building comprises two semi-detached houses of twelve rooms and two bathrooms.

HOW AN INDIAN BAND WAS CONVERTED

ABOUT twenty-six years ago, some Indians living on the Oka Reservation, near Montreal, Canada, which was then entirely Roman Catholic, petitioned the government for a tract of land where they might worship in the Protestant faith. The request being granted, a wild spot near Bala, in Ontario Province, was selected for the new reservation, and the name of "Gibson" was formally bestowed upon it.

In the early spring season the little band of red men, calling themselves Watha (Maple) Indians, set out for their new home. They numbered about twenty-five men, women and children. The journey was a long one, part of the way through tangled bush. The question as to what religious denomination the new tribe should join had been discussed and finally settled by Father Sahanatien, the oldest member, who had suffered imprisonment and other persecution at the hands of the Catholics:

"I am going to Montreal to-morrow," said he quietly; "let us join the denomination of the first Protestant minister I meet. Thus God will settle the question."

The first Protestant minister met happened to be a Wesleyan in faith, which is the reason why the Indians of the Gibson Reserve now belong to the Methodist Church.

Recently the writer spent several days on this reservation, with Rev. and Mrs. Wm. Kendall, at the Mission House. The Indians are the most advanced of the Parry Sound Agency. There are now 135 Indians on the reservation. They live in plain frame or log houses, tilling the soil, lumbering, cutting hemlock bark for tanneries, hunting, fishing, making baskets and other fancy articles for tourists in the summer season. Trapping animals for their fur is also a remunerative calling.

An effort is now being made to build a new church with a seating capacity of two hundred. There are four local preachers on the reservation. Chief Napoleon, Commandant (Chief of the Watha Band), preached and conducted the services in the morning. He took for his text the parable of the sower. I was much impressed with his earnestness. Mr. Kendall preached in the afternoon in both the French and English languages, the former for the benefit of the older people.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Kendall

Missionary to the Watha Indians

There are forty communicants in the church, and the Sunday School roll shows sixty names. Two Bible classes are conducted, one by Mr. Kendall, and one by David Swan, son of Chief Joseph, a convert to Protestantism, who translated the Gospels into Iroquois. These Indians are of Iroquois descent. Last year the sum of $128 was raised by this little band of one hundred and thirty-five Indians for mission work, home and foreign.

These Indians are very fond of singing hymns, and many have organs in their homes. They often close their merry "husking bees" by singing hymns.

Father Sahanatien, who led these Indians into Protestantism, is still living on the reserve, hale and hearty, at the age of seventy-six. Left an orphan at an early age, it fell to his lot to work in the Catholic Seminary at Oka.

One day, while he was putting in order one of the priests' rooms, something prompted him to open and read a little book which he saw on the table. It happened to be the New Testament. From that moment he desired a New Testament of his own. Years after one came into his possession, which he studied faithfully and read to others. The reasons for leaving the Romish Church came to him one day while singing at mass.

He talked the matter over with his friends, with the result that he and two others went from door to door asking the people to become Protestants. They were imprisoned for so doing, but not until forty-eight families had left the Roman Catholic Church.

HELEN GRAY.

THE OPTIMISM OF TO-DAY

*A THANKSGIVING SERMON BY REV. CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY, LL.D.

THE President of the United States has proclaimed, as usual at this season, a feast of joy and thanksgiving. He has urged that the people assemble in the churches in which they are accustomed to worship for the purpose of giving thanks to God for the many blessings wherewith he has blessed them during the year that is past. As loyal citizens, respectful of the suggestions of the Chief Magistrate, and as devout Christian people who, of our own motion, might fulfil the spirit of the executive proclamation, we gather together for the purpose mentioned.

Dr. C. T. Brady

The object of our service is that we may give thanks. The underlying principle of our devotions is that we may express our gratitude. The sin of ingratitude is one of the meanest into which humanity can fall. "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child." We are all, in the larger sense, children of a great Father, and he feels our insensibility to his love and care just as a human parent feels the careless indifference of the boy or girl upon whom has been lavished that wealth of affection which makes father and mother the sweetest words in the language.

Blow, blow, thou winter wind,
Thou art not so unkind
As man's ingratitude.

Freeze, freeze, thou bitter sky,
Thou dost not bite so nigh
As benefits forgot;
Though thou the waters warp,
Thy sting is not so sharp
As friend remembered not.

All that has been said about ingratitude, and much more that might be said, conversely applies to the virtue of which it is the opposite. We should indeed be grateful. But to whom, for what, and in what capacity?

Public Acknowledgment

This is more than a lesson in gratitude and thankfulness. It is an acknowledgment of the existence of God and the immanence of a Divine Providence in the affairs of the world. It is a public testimony to what we believe. It is a popular amendment to that venerable and venerated document by which we are. "There is no God," thoughtless men erroneously declare, "in the Constitution of the United States." If that were true, there is nevertheless a profound sense of God in the hearts of the people which is back of the Constitution; and the appointment of a Thanksgiving day reveals that truth. If things were only the results of fortuitous concurrences of chance happenings, there would be little sense in giving thanks; but because we feel and know that in God we live and move and have our being; "that every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of Lights with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning"; because we realize that there is a God in Israel, we are prepared to give thanks.

Every person in the land stands in a three-fold relationship to things external to himself. We are citizens of the United States; we are subjects of a better country—that is, a heavenly; and we are members of the human family. In order completely to fill out the measure of the day we should be thankful as Americans, as Christians, and as men.

What cause have we to be thankful as Americans? Instantly there flashes into the mind the thought of the unexampled prosperity which has come upon our native land. The wealth of the wooded hills; the hidden treasures of the granite mountains; the riches of the widespread prairies; the opulence of a thousand valleys are ours to command. We are the granary and the treasury of the world. So great has been the material reward of every species of labor and industry that we are literally embarrassed by our riches. The world, portions of which starve when the rain is withheld from our fields, looks to us with eager joy. The abundance of our estate has perhaps never been paralleled in any nation since the treasures of civilization were poured into the coffers of the City of the Seven Hills, when Rome was not only the Church, but the World.

For Peace and Progress

But these are the least of the things for which we should be thankful. No wars have disturbed us. The year has been one of peace and progress at home. Even the turbulence of our uncivilized wards has manifested itself so little that we may consider the work of pacification, which must precede the orderly development of independent citizenship, to have been accomplished. There have been some outrageous outbreaks of mob violence and disregard of law within our borders; but these have not failed to be of service in that more and more sternly does the spirit of our people reprehend them, and more and more rigorously are we determined to put them down, so that the law of man, which is perfect or imperfect as it approximates the law of God, shall keep that liberty in which we take just pride from degenerating into license.

Our position among the world-forces which are shaping the destinies of men every day grows higher, and the obligations of our opportunities are being met with a loftier conception of our national duty and destiny; which is to be a liberator, a pacificator and a light-bringer to the world. Long live the great Republic!

For these things indeed do we give thanks. "Let the people praise thee, O God; yea, let all the people praise thee."

What of the Church and the cause of Christ? President Roosevelt, speaking in one of our own parish churches, has declared that the nation which knows not God, in which the religious spirit wanes, falters, fails, is doomed to ruin, and he but voices the experience of humanity writ in the pages of history—that power charged with the promulgation of the judgment of God upon the pride of man.

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

It is character that makes men; it is Christ that makes character. Archbishop Ireland, the leading ecclesiastic in his faith in the opinion of his fellow countrymen, has supplemented the President's declaration by a similar note of warning at the banquet of the Army of the Cumberland. The beginning of folly, to paraphrase and illuminate the Psalmist's word, is the denial of God. We must cling to God through Christ our Lord, if we are to go forward and rise to the measure of the opportunities of our future.

For Providential Care

Sometimes things look dark. Despair often overwhelms us. The forces of evil are so gigantic and so clamant that the quieter powers of God, the still small voices in human hearts amid the earthquake shock, the great and mighty winds, the flames of fire, but persisting when these have spent themselves, are after all the explanation of that otherwise inexplicable assertion, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

History's pages but record
One death grapple in the darkness 'twixt old systems and the Word.
Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne;
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own.

We thank God and take courage that the Lord reigneth and keepeth watch above his own.

And there are signs of the times which encourage a cheerful optimism. I know no ethics aside from religion; I know no religion aside from Christ. The ethical conduct of men evidences, although sometimes the connection is obscure, the nature of their faith and trust and hope. Never was there an age of such charity. Never was there so much money poured out freely in unstinted measure for the service of men; and sometimes may we not believe that even the so-called tainted dollar may be hallowed by that to which it is devoted, or by that sentiment which inspired its gift? The public conscience has been awakened, and is now aroused to public duties as never before since the day Adams and Jefferson and Franklin and Henry thundered defiance to any enemy who would assail the government by a united people. For malversation in office, for malfeasance and misfeasance in corporations, for breaches of trust, for illegal combinations for restraint of manufacture, trade or labor there are great searchings of heart. All over the land public interest is keenly alive to the public weal, and this is one of the things for which above all others we express our gratitude and joy. Unless there had been some awakening of this kind, we might almost have despaired of the republic.

For Church Life and Purity

The Church with renewed vigor and zeal is grappling with the evils of the present. She is the force which is back of public opinion. There is an oft-mooted question as to the relative power of pulpit and press. There can be but one answer, for it is the pulpit which inspires the trenchant pen of the editor. It is the pulpit which shows him the light and the truth and the way of salvation. The Church has demonstrated conclusively that it is no loosely compacted organization for mere ethical teaching, but that it has standards of belief which it will maintain, and requires that Christ and his Gospel shall be preached from its pulpits.

And now we come to the last of the categories, that of the individual. For what have we to be thankful as men? Health, food, raiment, love, joy, peace? Why, 'tis easy for a man to be grateful for these. "If ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans the same?" But suppose there is a question about some of these things? There may be some lives sequestered, simple, passed "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife," in which the year has brought no trouble, in which there have been no bereavements and no losses, in which no hopes have been left ungratified, no aspirations unfulfilled, in which there have been no dreams that have not come true. But such lives are rare, and I doubt if any who read this can look back upon them.

And again, it is not very difficult to be thankful when the good has overbalanced the evil, and I am of the opinion that that condition is one in which all of us practically find ourselves, although we do not all know it, or admit it. But when the year has been one of sorrow to us; when we have lost, or think we have lost more than we have gained; when death has knocked upon the door of our hearts and taken from us the tenants thereof; when we sigh for "the touch of a vanished hand," and long for "the sound of a voice that is still"; when we dream of "the tender grace of a day that is dead," that will never come back to us; when poverty has been our lot; when black Care has dogged our heels; when humiliation and shame have lowered about our pathway; when we have been compelled, in the words of Ezekiel, to "pass under the rod" of sorrow, of suffering, of despair, why, then the giving of thanks becomes the hardest of tasks. And it is to this group, in which so many of us find ourselves, that I address this sermon to-day.

The Sweet Uses of Adversity

If the hand of the Lord has been heavy upon us, or if our own hands have fashioned the yoke; if we have fainted and fallen in the Via Dolorosa of the year under the burden of the cross, finding no sturdy Cyrenean brother to relieve us of its weight, oh, then, thanksgiving at first may seem a mockery. Yet the true nobility of our souls is measured by the way that we endure. "A mind undisturbed in adversity," was the phrase placed on the memorial to a great man who had borne and suffered and triumphed, and after all it only expresses the consolations of a philosophy vastly different from the burning, ardent feeling of gratitude which we must pour out before God even for our afflictions and troubles. "What? shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord and not receive evil?" cries Job.

The load across our shoulders indeed is a heavy one, the rod seems a grievous burden; but may I be pardoned for the interpretation if I say, "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me"? For what says the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews? "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; but afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them who are exercised thereby." But we must remember, although perhaps it is hard to understand, "that whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

These sufferings are for our profit; they are the sweet uses of adversity, "which, like the toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in his head." And we may give thanks for our troubles for this; that rightly used they will at least help us to a better way of living. Every deprivation on earth will teach us the unsearchable riches of God; every breaking of the spirit will teach us that ours is the kingdom of heaven; every wrench of the heart in mourning shall tell us of the comfort of the hereafter; all the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," every persecution, shall assure us of the immunities of the future; every sickening hunger or thirst shall tell us of the precious food of righteousness. Every one "loved long since and lost awhile" means a warmer greeting upon the farther side.

As life runs on, the road grows strange
With faces new, and near the end
The milestones into headstones change,
'Neath every one a friend.

Oh, no, 'tis not beneath the milestones that they stand, those friends of ours, but within the golden bars of heaven, hands outstretched, faces a-shine, voices raised, waiting to welcome you and me.

Sooner or later we must have trouble; sooner or later the words that I have said here are applicable to us all. What are troubles but things to be borne? What are sorrows but things to be healed? What are griefs but things to be assuaged? What are sins but things to be repented of and forgiven? Listen, O sufferers of today. You can each hear a voice:

'Tis the voice of your God,
"I love thee—I love thee, Pass under the rod."

There is an ancient tale in Roman history of how the legions of the republic, trapped in a defile of the mountains and taken at grave disadvantage, were compelled to surrender to the Samnites. The legionaries were disarmed. A yoke made of three of their own spears was erected; under it they were forced to pass, and then amid the mockery of their enemies they were allowed to go free. Burning under the stigma of disgrace, frenzied by the humiliation inflicted upon them, they turned upon the Samnites and with the memory

[illegible]

I might close without another word, and yet I cannot. Thanksgiving Day is a day of happiness to most of you. You are going from your house of worship to your homes. Families will reunite to-day with loving thoughts for the absent and the missing. Children will cluster around the dinner table loaded with the lavish fruits of the earth. There will be the sound of the cheerful laugh, the merry jest, the thankful heart. Dull care will be thrown aside, and together you will be happy. I rejoice that it is so, beloved. Let us all rejoice and thank God and take courage. I would not dim the lustre of your happiness in any way. And yet in closing I would beseech you to remember two people, both of whom have passed under the rod: your brother, sick, suffering, poor, sinful, who is even now under the rod. Remember him and do what you can for him by giving him the helping hand.

And your elder brother, Jesus Christ, who passed under the awful rod of Calvary that you might eat your bread in peace. Remember him at this hour and all hours. He has given you all. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends." And before you break bread in your Thanksgiving feast, remember his gift of himself to you and for you, and say with heart and voice: "We praise thee, O God, for our creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life; but above all, for thine inestimable love and the redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ; for the means of grace, and the hope of glory."

THANKSGIVING

GREAT God, we sing thy love alway,
For thou art ever wondrous kind;
But on this glad Thanksgiving Day
New songs of praise our lips shall find.

From out thy wealthy larder fed,
We praise thee for our daily store;
Thou hast our table richly spread,
And we have had enough and more.

When clouds our pathway have beset,
And life has seemed a wilderness,
Thou didst not us at all forget;
Thou then wast near to help and bless.

The year hath told the story old,
The story of thy love and grace;
Through summer's heat and winter's cold,
The same sweet characters we trace.

Great God, we sing thy love alway,
Thy goodness ever bear in mind;
And still will praise and still will pray,
For thou art ever wondrous kind.

A Thanksgiving Sketch

"ONE-EGG CAKE"

By Margaret E. Sangster

"CONSIDERING the hard times, Madam Chairman, I move that the society study economy in entertainments the coming winter. The Ladies' Aid is about to give a church sociable the first of the season. I suppose there will be others later on; we have always had refreshments and should we dispense with them altogether I am afraid we would have a lot of empty benches."

The speaker paused, glanced around the circle of matrons, observed expectation in their faces and went firmly on.

"I won't make a motion," she added, "at least not yet. But with the permission of the Chair, can we not discuss this practical matter at this meeting? In view of the price of eggs and butter, of sugar and spice, of flour and milk and everything else that goes into cake, can we afford to serve rich cakes at our receptions? Shall we not decide to offer our friends one-egg cake and omit strong coffee? Weak coffee is better for the nerves anyway."

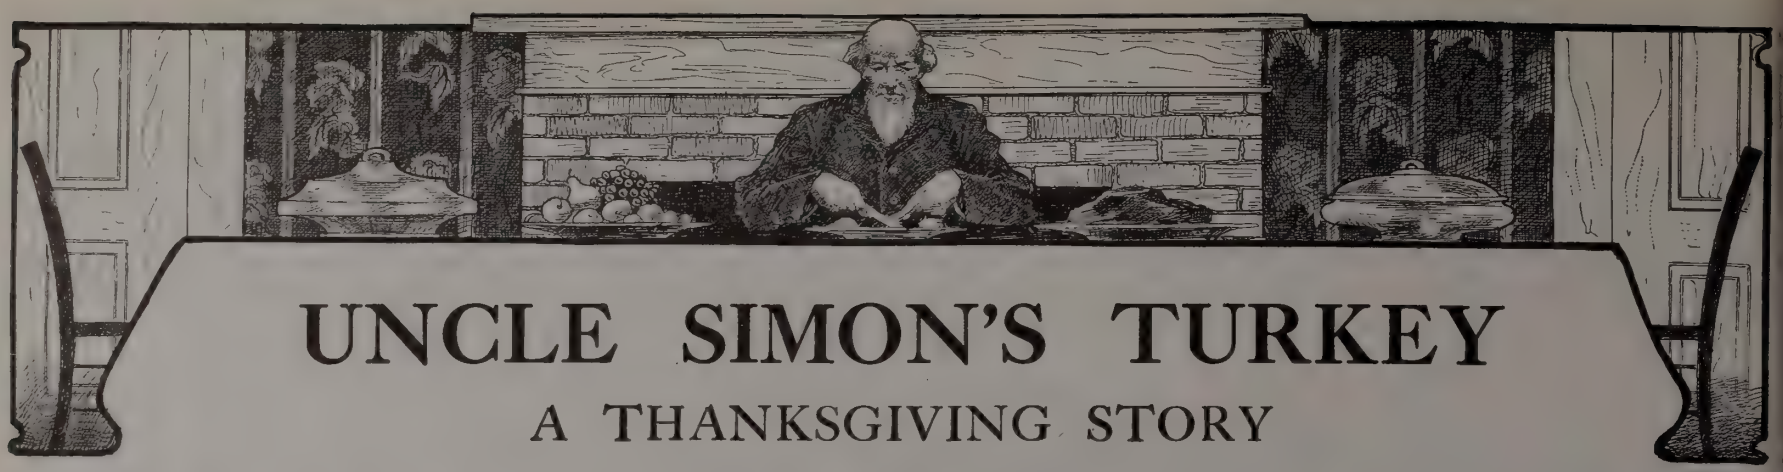
"One-egg cake is very plain and the men will stay away if we give them poor coffee. Can we not have the same grade of cake as formerly and make the coffee after the same recipe, for economy's sake cutting the cake thinner and pouring the coffee into smaller cups?" This was the suggestion of a woman who had long been a social engineer in church matters.

The Ladies' Aid Society of Centreville had for years done much of the self-denying work that is part of the province of women in most of our churches. When the church needed a new carpet or cushions or renovation inside or out, when a floating debt was to be raised or a mortgage decreased, the women went to work with a will, had fairs and bazars, suppers and concerts, and in one way or another managed to augment the treasury by goodly sums of money. Centreville was famous for notable housekeepers and good home cooking, but when the periodical return of hard times swept the land over like a chilling frost, the need of frugality sternly impressed on the poor man closed down with iron hold on the consciences and impulses of the richer neighbor who just then should have been spending instead of saving money.

Mrs. Foster Arkright, who had proposed one-egg cake and weak coffee as suitable refreshments in a hard-times year, and whose will and influence were usually paramount in the counsels of the sisterhood, was a woman of large wealth and an income so safely bestowed by the forethought of her deceased father and the sagacity of her husband, that she ought always to have been distinguished by an open hand, yet this year of all years she had set an example of scant expenditure all along the line. She had been in the habit of keeping three maids; she had dismissed two and was managing her home with a single domestic. She had bought no new gowns this year and was proudly wearing her last year's bonnet. She it was whose proposition of one-egg cake and weak coffee had been thrown as a projectile into the quiet camp of the Ladies' Aid. What they would have done about it had a motion been made and the question put to vote, nobody can tell, but as Mrs. Arkright took her seat a modest little lady on the other side of the room rose. She addressed the Chair, as everybody has learned to do by this time, and then in a low but distinct voice declared that she for one disagreed with the previous speaker. "If we must economize," she said, "and probably the majority will be compelled to, let us not begin in the church. Suppose we begin at home. The children will thrive and flourish on bread and molasses, and we may, if we like, omit cake from the home bill of fare; but when we are making an offering in the Lord's cause, don't let us set a fashion of being close-fisted and mean. I, for one, would greatly prefer serving no refreshments at our sociable to serving poor ones, nor do I believe in cutting the slices too thin or in using the smaller cups. Think of the young men and young women whose only experience of church hospitality is at our receptions. Some of them are away from home. Most of them are working very hard all the week. On Sunday they come to the church and the Christian Endeavor and meet sympathy and fellowship, and are invited on Wednesday evening to come to the church home and have a happy time. Part of this happy time culminates in the breaking of bread together. I think the bread and the cake and whatever we give, let the times be what they may outside the church, should be of the finest of the wheat and the choicest of flavoring."

The little lady had finished her speech and resumed her place at the back of the room. Others followed her and the question was tossed back and forth like a ball from hand to hand. Finally, the decision reached was that where sacrifices must be made they should be made at home and that church gatherings should be as affluent of good cheer, as overflowing with bounty, as ever before. One egg cake was not to be accepted as the symbol of Centreville hospitality.

To one listener it seemed as if the Ladies' Aid had been guided to the wisest conclusion. Retrenchment is often advisable, and superfluous cake may be cut off, but hard times are made harder when those who can afford to do otherwise reduce their expenses simply because the spirit of economy is in the air. Economy in its root meaning signifies government and wise management, not merely the reduction to the minimum of every cent expended. The woman who in hard times runs her house on half steam, shuts off its suddenly meagre heat because her neighbor does so, becomes exchequer having suffered no [illegible]. It is no credit to her to wear old clothes when she can amply afford new ones, thus beating the dressmaker and the milliner, and so set [illegible] adrift while she can as well as ever before keep them and pay them wages. People who [illegible] their consciences, so to speak, at the church door, substituting their contributions, taking settings instead of [illegible] and bestowing their contributions instead of dispensing them, attempt Providence by an attitude [illegible] to the divine goodness.



UNCLE SIMON'S TURKEY

A THANKSGIVING STORY

By Susan M. Griffith

UNCLE SIMON ATWOOD sat on the little porch of his humble cottage, watching the sun go down in a flood of golden glory.

Although quite late in November, it was remarkably mild and balmy, as it so often is in the beautiful Southland, and Uncle Simon loved the porch. Even when the frosty days began to come, and the wind tore around the corners, heralding the rapid approach of winter, he could still be found on his small front porch, wrapped in his overcoat.

Well, it was lonely within doors, for Uncle Simon had lived alone for upwards of seven years, now; and the four walls and vacant chair opposite his own, beside the fire, were not very good company; his dear old wife, Jerusha, having folded her tired hands and fallen into the sleep the Lord giveth unto his beloved.

Uncle Simon had chosen to abide alone ever since her death; not from necessity, but from choice. He did his own cooking and washing, and wore his clothes unironed, spent his days in puttering about his little garden and among his chickens and other poultry, and was peacefully content and seemingly happy. Once every day he traveled down to the corner store and sat a while among his old companions and neighbors, listening to the reading of the daily paper, and talking over the items of village news; and Sundays he always put on his old blue suit with the brass buttons, and went to morning service. The balance of the time Uncle Simon sat on the little porch in his old arm chair, gazing wistfully at the blue sky and distant hills. Often a neighbor would stop, lean on the little gate and chat for half an hour with the old man, whose genial ways and kindly, unselfish heart made him a universal favorite; and, on this particular November evening, the neighbor happened to be Josiah Pratt.

"Hello, Uncle Simon!" he called out cheerily; "how goes it?"

"Firstrate, firstrate, Josiah," replied the old man. "Couldn't be better. Did you ever see a finer sunset than that? Looks almost like the gates of heaven was throwed wide open, don't it? and the glory light was streamin' out."

"It does that," said Josiah. "You're right there, for sure, Uncle Simon. There's a heap of mighty fine color in that there sky. By-the-way, what you going to do with your turkey, Uncle Simon? Going to eat him for Thanksgiving?"

"Oh, I reckon not!" chuckled Uncle Simon. "I ain't no call to have a turkey dinner. A chicken's good enough for me any time, and I don't know as I need to bother about a chicken, even; for Mrs. Wesley most always sends me over a big plate of dinner, and last year your folks did, too, and so did Mrs. Abel. I had enough good victuals to last me most a week. It beats all how good and kind folks are. Mrs. Wesley sent me ice cream every time she made it this whole summer, and I'm powerful fond of ice cream."

"You ought to go somewhere and eat Thanksgiving and Christmas dinner every year, Uncle Simon. We'd be mighty glad to have you over to our house this year. Do come!"

"It's right nice and kind of you, Josiah," said the old man, "and I certainly do appreciate it; but I reckon not! I reckon not! I sort of like to eat at home, someway. I always set a plate and a chair for Jerushy, and pretend she's with me, you know. Of course it's sort of foolish, maybe, but there's a lot of comfort in pretending sometimes, after all. We all get to be kind of like children again, Josiah, as we near the bound of life." And again the old man's wistful gaze sought the golden glory in the western sky.

"Well," said Pratt, after a respectful silence of a moment or two, "my wife wanted me to ask you about that turkey of yours, Uncle Simon, whether you'd be willing to sell it or not. Turkeys are dreadful scarce this year, and she's kind of got it in her head, 'No turkey, no Thanksgiving!' And she asked the minister to dinner, I guess; I heard her talking about it. So, that's the way things is situated, you see, Uncle Simon; and if women folks can't have their way, there ain't no peace in the family. So, now, what do you say?"

Uncle Simon did not say anything for some minutes. His gaze rested affectionately upon his cherished little flock of poultry who were just making arrangements to turn in for the night. He had only one turkey. There were ten in the beginning, but the old hen, under whose wings he had set the eggs, had managed to raise but one. And that one Uncle Simon had made a decided pet of. Again and again had he refused the most tempting offers for that one turkey. So now, he slowly and gravely shook his head.

"I'll tell you what it is, Josiah," he said at last: "I feel sort of queer about that turkey. Seems like he's reserved for something. I just can't sell him. Tobias Ames wanted him the worst way, and I come mighty nigh letting him go, too, but, somehow, I couldn't do it. I backed out at the last minute. I'd like powerful well to oblige you, Josiah, I would so; but it does seem like it wa'n't quite right to part with that turkey. Is that the stage coming up this way? My eyes are getting so I can't see well at a distance. I reckon I'll have to get me some fur-off glasses right soon, now."

"'Is it you, Cora?' cried the old man, all of a tremble"

"Yes, that's the stage," said Pratt. "I'd like mighty well to know what it's coming up this way for. I reckon the folks on the hill's going to have company for Thanksgiving."

Josiah said "The folks on the hill," because the stage seldom, if ever, brought any one to visit at any other home in simple old Briartown. The folks on the hill were the Briartown aristocracy, let it be understood, having a son at college and a married daughter in New York.

But the stage did not go on up the hill. Instead of doing that, to Josiah Pratt's and Uncle Simon's unbounded amazement, it drew up before the gate of the latter, with a grand flourish and a loud, portentous "Whoa!" from the driver.

Uncle Simon sat leaning forward and holding hard to the arms of his chair, in a staring, helpless attitude, his faded old eyes trying to make out who was getting out of the coach.

A very handsome lady and an exceedingly pretty little girl; there they were, standing right in front of the gate, which Josiah had hastened to open for them, and a big trunk was being thrown off the top of the stage. What did it all mean? Not a word said; Uncle Simon only sat and stared dumbly as the driver preceded his passengers to the house with the trunk on his shoulder. Setting it down on the porch floor with a thump, he called out:

"Well, Uncle Simon, you're in luck. Got the only visitors for Thanksgiving of any one in Briartown. I reckon you ain't forgot your adopted daughter, Cora, have you? The little girl you took to raise when she warn't nothin' but a baby? This is her, and this is her own little girl. She's come way from the Pacific Coast to see you. I reckon that's an honor, now, ain't it?"

Cora, little Cora! Could it be? Remember her? Oh, could he ever forget the winsome girl Jerusha and he had loved so well? They had never had any children of their own, and the child they had taken into their hearts and home had been everything to them. And then, in the very flower of her girlhood, she had married suddenly and left them without a word of warning, and gone to the far West. They had not approved of the marriage, for the man was a stranger, and the little they heard from their dear girl fully justified their objections. For many years, however, there had been an utter silence between Cora and her adopted parents, and the dear old wife and mother had died with one great longing unsatisfied. "If I could only see Cora just once, and know that she was well and happy, I could die quite content, Simon," she would say again and again.

The old man reached forth his hands, all of a tremble: "Is it you, Cora, sure enough? It can't be, I reckon! There must be some mistake!"

"No, no, dear father, it is no mistake!" said the lady, throwing both arms about the old man's neck. "I am alone in the world as you are. My husband is dead, and my three older children and this little girl are all I have left. My heart yearned for the old home and I felt that I must come back. I do not know that I would be welcome, for I treated you cruelly, father, dear; but I remembered the story of the Prodigal Son, and I thought I knew your heart, and so I came. I can say from my heart that I am not worthy to be your daughter, but I want to stay and serve you as long as I live. I am sure you will not turn me away, dear, dear father."

"Turn you away! Turn you away! Oh, child, child, child, if only your loving mother was here to help me welcome you back home!"

The next day as Josiah Pratt was going by, Uncle Simon hurried down the path to him.

"Hold on, Josiah!" he panted. "I want you and your wife and Mrs. Wesley's and Abel's folks to all come and eat Thanksgiving dinner with us. I'm going to have a kind of house-warming in honor of Cora and the child. Come and bring the minister. I know

Our Unequaled New Red Letter Bible

What is a Red Letter Bible?

A Red Letter Bible differs from an ordinary Bible in many important points. While the text is the same in both Bibles, the ordinary Bible is printed in black throughout, but the Red Letter Bible employs two colors, viz., Red and Black. Although the black color largely predominates, the red color is used to excellent advantage, thus:

FIRST—In the Old Testament all passages quoted by our Lord, or referred to by him, are printed in red.

SECOND—In the New Testament all the words universally accepted as spoken by our Saviour are printed in red.

* * *

THIRD—Every verse in the Old Testament which embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah is distinguished by a red star.

The style of type used in this Bible is the same throughout, whether the passage is printed in black or in red.

The Words of Our Lord

It is interesting just here to recall the divergence of opinion among a group of notable clergymen, who were in conference in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices when the question was put to them: "What percentage of the Gospels do you think was actually spoken by Christ himself?" One answered about ten per cent., another said fifteen per cent., while a third ventured to estimate them at twenty-five per cent. An investigation revealed that all the clergymen were wrong and that the actual number spoken by our Lord equaled nearly one-half of all the words contained in the Gospels.

The Red Letter Bible gives the exact proportion, and according to it Christ uttered of the Gospels as follows:

Of Matthew,	54	per cent.
Of Mark,	36	"
Of Luke,	55	"
Of John,	41	"

or an average of 47½ per cent. of them all.

Thus, nearly half of the words contained in the Gospels were spoken by our Lord. The relative length of the Gospels is as follows: Matthew, 5,050 lines; Mark, 3,206 lines; Luke, 5,350 lines; John, 3,952 lines.

Our Lord's References to the Old Testament

It is also interesting to learn how many quotations from the Old Testament and how many references to incidents mentioned in the Old Testament were made by Christ during his earthly ministry. The Red Lettering through the Old Testament promptly and correctly answers these questions. We find the ever-memorable words our Saviour used on the cross, when he said, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" to be the opening words of the 22d Psalm, and of course this quotation is printed in red in the Old Testament. Then the words, "Into thy hand I commend my spirit," are the opening words of the 5th verse of the 31st Psalm, and are also printed in red; and the new commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," may be found printed in red in the 18th verse of the 19th chapter of Leviticus.

Then the story of the Fiery Serpents, the ceremonies to be observed by lepers, the story of Lot, the words which Christ read from the Old Testament when he sat in the Synagogue at Nazareth, the story of Jonah, and hundreds of other interesting passages and quotations are all quickly brought to the attention of the reader, the teacher, the superintendent, the student, or the pastor by appearing conspicuously in Red Lettering among the black text of the Bible.

Thus we have emphasized in red in this beautiful Bible all the words recorded as having been actually uttered by Christ, all the references he made to the Old Testament and all the quotations which he used in his discourses during his earthly ministry. In addition to all this, every reference to Christ as the coming Messiah is clearly marked with a red star.

Small Bibles in Great Demand

Heretofore, large Bibles were preferred on account of their low cost, but now the demand is for small Bibles printed from clear and easily legible type on thin paper of light weight. This demand is met in our new Red Letter Bible, which, though weighing only one pound and four ounces, is as legible as our former Red Letter Bible, weighing nearly three times as much, the contents being absolutely the same. Bold face type of our special design and India paper enabled us to achieve this great triumph in Bible-making.

A Statement From Dr. Klopsch

TWO years ago I set my heart upon making a better Bible for "The Christian Herald" subscribers than could be found on the market. I determined that the Bible should be small; that the type should be large; that the paper should be thin and of light weight; that there should be References, Helps and Maps, and that the Binding should be as good as the best. The result of our efforts is stated below, and I feel sure that every prospective purchaser will be delighted with the new Bible. LOUIS KLOPSCH.

This Middle Column is in the Same Type that is Used in Our New Bible

We looked over all the different faces of type and found none that suited our ideas as to legibility, so we had a type specially designed, and had steel dies cut from which to cast it. There were 125 different characters cut and cast, and when the work was done we considered that it was not as good as it might have been. Then we ordered another set of steel dies from another type foundry, and when that type was cast we discovered that some of the characters were weak, and these we supplanted by other and better ones. Finally we finished the whole 125 characters, and every one was practically perfect. A better type for the purpose has never yet been devised.

No other Bible in the World is Like unto it

The Paper of Our New Bible

We made a thorough search in American and English paper markets, but they had nothing to offer as good as we required it. Finally a firm of American paper brokers undertook to have manufactured for us in Italy a paper that promised to prove altogether satisfactory, and when it arrived six months after the order was given, we found that it measured up to all that had been claimed for it. It is India paper, made in Italy, almost as thin as onion skin, and yet so thoroughly opaque that, when seen in the Bible, one can scarcely believe that it is printed on both sides, for not a letter in the entire book shows through. Then the paper is so light that the entire Bible with Helps and Maps weighs only ONE POUND and four ounces.

As to the Binding

For a book so valuable, so important, and so exquisite, the binding must needs be in keeping with the contents; hence, in settling on the material to be used for the binding, we determined that it must be rich, durable, flexible and attractive. After examining many varieties and many grades, we decided to use real Morocco, the same as is used only on the costliest Bibles. The Standard Dictionary defines real Morocco as "A leather made from goat skin; named after the city of Morocco. It was originally a product of the Levant, Turkey and Mediterranean Africa, and is distinguished for pliancy, fineness and toughness of texture, which fit it particularly for bookbinding." This correctly describes the leather which we selected, and in which the entire edition has been bound.

Of course this Bible is bound in Divinity Circuit. That is, it has round corners, red under gold, and overlapping edges. There is no more attractive Bible on the market. It is made of the best materials throughout, and five years ago $15 would have been considered the right price.

Size and Contents of Our New Bible

The Version used in this Bible is that known as the King James or Authorized Version. The Spelling is modern. The References are in the centre of the page. The Text of the Bible is set in bold-face minion, and covers 1,203 pages. Then there are 268 pages of Helps and 17 excellent Maps. The volume measures 7¼ inches in length, 5⅛ inches in width and 1 inch in thickness, and weighs only 20 ounces. The result is a gem of a Bible, small in size, light in weight, very legible, very durable and beautiful to look upon—the greatest achievement in modern Bible-making.

Exclusively for Our Subscribers and Not Sold to Any Others

As it took six months to secure the paper and six months to print the edition, it will be out of the question to get additional copies until the Fall of 1908; hence we are determined to reserve this entire edition for "Christian Herald" subscribers exclusively.

The Price of Our New Bible

One would suppose that a Bible manufactured on such generous lines must necessarily be an expensive one. India Paper Bibles bound in real Morocco and Leather Lined are seldom listed at less than $10; even then they are not Red Letter Bibles, which feature adds materially to the cost. But we know that very few people can afford to pay that much money for a Bible, and as we are anxious to ultimately secure for this superb book a circulation of at least a million copies, we have decided to offer this first Edition at an Introductory Bargain Price. Here it is: Any subscriber to "The Christian Herald" who acts before these ten thousand Bibles are sold may, by sending FOUR DOLLARS, have his subscription to "The Christian Herald" RENEWED for one year, and receive, all charges prepaid, one of these Superb New Red Letter Bibles. If you want it act quickly or you will be too late. Money refunded if not fully pleased. Address:

A Perpetual Guest

The Red Letter Bible, received all right, and has been the most welcome guest in our home ever since. We would not part with it for many times its cost. Some days it is the only book we read, and it is a perpetual guest. Its pages are as fragrant as the flowers in the good spring.

"May It Enter Many Homes"

The Red Letter Bible came safe to hand. It was so well pleased it may not express it to the best. I have [illegible] since I had opportunity. The type is so clear it teaches you to pay attention to what you are reading. [illegible] makes it very precious for general use. May it enter many homes and be the means of salvation to many souls.

"A Lamp to the Feet"

Received the Red Letter Edition of the Bible, and am very much pleased with it. I consider it a good investment. I hope as we read its pages it may be a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path. I would not part with it and I consider it as one of the necessaries of our life.

I trust you may send many of these Bibles into homes, and that it may direct many to Christ.

A 20th Century Bible

Mr. E. H. Phelps, New York, writes: "I am more than pleased with the Red Letter Edition Bible received yesterday, as a premium with The Christian Herald, and delighted. It is a duplicate book of all the Concordances in particular, the type is clear and bold, and [illegible] all the distinguishing features of the Red Letter Bible is not only novel but very convenient. It is a 20th century idea."

The Stars That Point to Christ

On my return to the city I found an express package awaiting me, which proved to be an specimen copy of the Red Letter Bible. The red print is at first a surprise and then it is a pleasure to note its [illegible] over the old. I appreciate the stars which guide the reader to Bethlehem in the Christmas story from which I had read a particular friend as he called across a red letter passage here and there.

Thanksgiving

WHILE every day is a thanksgiving day to the Christian, it is well that there should be an annual day set apart for general national thanksgiving. There are so many of us who might otherwise forget how many things there are for which we should be thankful; and a still greater number who might forget to whom they should be thankful. We get so accustomed to our blessings, that we are apt to overlook them until they are withdrawn, and then in our deprivation we realize how good it was to have them. No man realizes how precious was a right arm so thoroughly as he who now has an empty sleeve; no man is so conscious of the joys of the home gathering, as he who on this Thanksgiving Day is homeless and friendless. We should not wait for the stern lessons of such hard teachers, but take stock of the blessings on hand, regardless of those we wish for, but have not, and be thankful for the good things we enjoy.

Above all, our thoughts and thanks should rise to Him who is the Giver of every good and perfect gift. As a nation we have abundant reason for this attitude. What public sorrow and gloom is weighing on us at this year's celebration comes from human hands. Many are mourning the poverty that has come on them like an armed man. But that comes from the bungling or the trickery or the unscrupulous avarice of men, unworthy of the trust reposed in them. God has done his part in the national welfare. He has given us abundant harvests, and has provided us in rich measure with the fruits of nature. He has blessed us beyond all the nations of the earth, and we can but say with the Psalmist: "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness!"

Our thanksgiving should not be the mere utterance of the lip. The thankful heart is not content to express itself in words. We show our gratitude to God in the best way by our deeds of mercy. It was a kindly thing that Christ did in making the poor his representatives. He reminded us that they are ever with us and whensoever we will, we may do them good, and He promised to recognize the kindness to them as service rendered to himself. Thus the act of benevolence brings a triple return. The recipient benefits and rejoices; the giver learns as he learns in no other way, how glad his own heart can be made; and Christ himself looks on with approval and says to us, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto them, ye did it unto me." Should not this triple incentive stir every Christian heart to kind deeds? Is there any family needing aid in our neighborhood? Is there anyone to whom this Thanksgiving Day seems like a mockery, by reason of poverty or affliction? There is the opportunity for winning the triple reward. The day demands our gifts and our thoughtful consideration, and it should not pass without the performance of some act by which we show, in practical fashion, our own gratitude for the mercies God has conferred upon us.

The New Duma

RUSSIA'S third Parliament opened auspiciously with prayer at the Tauride Palace, St. Petersburg, on November 14. The Metropolitan, or highest functionary of the Russian Church, attended by a large body of ecclesiastics, conducted the services. The national hymn was sung, the Czar was cheered. President Stolypin, his Cabinet, and the Vice-President of the Imperial Council smiled their approval of the proceedings, and the new Parliament was fairly launched upon its career.

Will that career, like those of its predecessors, be a brief and stormy one? Or will it justify the optimistic hopes of conservative Russians and prove itself essentially a conservative body? If one might base any judgment on outward appearances, the new Duma, with its preponderance of staid and well-dressed, prosperous-looking landlords, its rows of ex-bureaucrats, its priests and its professors, certainly gives promise of a calmer legislative existence than the last. Russia's Liberal press has dubbed it a "Landowners' Parliament," and decline to recognize it as a representative body, but admits that it may accomplish much good, under reasonably favorable conditions. It is certainly of a higher intellectual standard than the last two Dumas, in which there were many representatives from the peasantry. Its President, M. Khomyakoff, who is both a poet and a government official, is said to be a man of liberal ideas, with much ability, and a disposition to be impartial. He has announced the immediate parliamentary programme to be the examination of the budget and the recent laws, especially those that relate to agrarianism and the fredom of the people and the press.

Some idea of the complexion of the Duma may be gathered from the fact that of 392 districts the Monarchists captured 195, the Moderates 128, the Constitutional Democrats 41, and the Leftists 28. It is believed by the friends of order that several of the political factions will unite to form a Constitutionalist Centre, which, while not taking its orders from the government, will nevertheless represent the best conservative interests of the country. President Khomyakoff believes that such a union would enable the Duma to accomplish much toward Russia's reformation.

On the whole, therefore, the outlook for the new Parliament is promising. There are, it is true, elements with latent possibilities of discord, and these, together with the oppressive vigilance of the Russian police—nearly 500 of whom were on guard at the opening—must be regarded as sources from which trouble may come. Meanwhile the best wishes of all civilized nations will go out to the new Duma, in its efforts to ameliorate the condition of the Russian people.

"In God We Trust"

WHILE the removal from the coinage of the time-honored national motto, "In God We Trust," is regarded by many as a matter of little consequence, it has evoked throughout the country a sentiment in favor of restoration which demands a hearing. Advocates of elimination contend that there is no warrant in law for the inscription; that it is incongruous and irreverent to stamp the name of the Deity upon our money, and that, apart from these reasons, artistic considerations alone would justify its omission. On the other hand, it is shown conclusively, by reference to the official records of the Treasury Department and to Acts of Congress, that legislative authority does exist for the use of the motto.

This recognition of God in words stamped upon our national coinage, has an interesting history, which was first published in a report of the Director of the United States Mint. In 1861, the Rev. M. R. Watkinson, of Ridleyville, Pa., wrote to Hon. Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury in Lincoln's cabinet, suggesting that the words "God, liberty, law" be engrossed on the coinage, "to relieve us from the ignominy of heathenism and place us openly under the Divine protection we have personally claimed." He further pointed out that the antiquarians of succeeding centuries should know from our coins that we were not a heathen nation. "From my heart," he added, "I have felt our national shame in disowning God as not the least of our present national disasters."

Secretary Chase accepted the suggestion, and in a letter of instructions to the Director of the U. S. Mint (November, 1861), he gave his reasons for the adoption of a national motto, recognizing the Deity. It is to be noted that the reasons the Secretary assigned in favor of such a motto were precisely the reverse of those who now claim that the motto is irreverent and ridiculous. Mr. Chase regarded it as a sincere and devout expression of the holiest feeling of which a nation was capable. He wrote to Director Pollock:

> No nation can be strong except in the strength of God, or safe except in his defense. The trust of our people in God should be declared on our national coins. You will cause a device to be prepared, without unnecessary delay, with a motto expressing in the fewest and tersest words possible, this national recognition.

As certain mottoes and devices had already been prescribed for the coinage by the Act of 1837, new legislation became necessary. Several devices were submitted in 1863, and those which read, "Our God and Our Country," and, "In God We Trust," were approved. On April 22, 1864, an Act was passed authorizing the coinage of two-cent bronze pieces on which the motto, "In God We Trust," appeared for the first time. A later Act, on March 3, 1865, authorized the placing of the motto upon "such coins as shall admit of the inscription thereon," and under this Act it appeared the same year on the double eagle, eagle and half eagle, and the dollar, half and quarter dollar. A further Act of Congress, in 1873, authorized the imprint of the motto on all coins that would admit of its use. In the Revised Statutes of 1874 there is no reference to the motto.

Sanctioned by law and publicly approved by over forty years' uninterrupted usage, the famous words are now interwoven with our nation's history. Their use has become an honored national custom and a tradition. It is not surprising, therefore, that their omission from the coinage should have encountered opposition first of all from the ministry, since the motto originated in a minister's suggestion. There is little doubt that the examples set by the Protestant Episcopal Diocesan Convention in New York, and the Presbyterian Brotherhood in Ohio, lately, in adopting resolutions protesting against the change—on the ground that "the highest interest of our country demands the preservation of all those customs that have stood for the recognition of God in the life of people"—will find many warm supporters.

We are a Christian nation, and there can be nothing incongruous in the honest and reverent recognition of the fact in our business and public affairs. And surely this recognition on the face of our coins, which has stood the test nearly half a century, is one of which we need not be ashamed. It was our expression of the religious unity of the nation in a time of great stress and trial. To-day, there is no less need of the acknowledgment that a Divine hand guides our destinies, than there was in the days of Abraham Lincoln.

Our New Serial Story

IN the issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 11, there will appear the first chapters of a new and fascinating serial story, entitled

"The Mischief-Makers"

It is a powerful tale, full of strong dramatic passages, and it deals with the American life of to-day in a typical Western town. The author, Mary McCrae Culter, has already won an enviable reputation as a writer of wholesome modern stories, and The Mischief-Makers is indisputably the best she has ever written. It is a story of the under currents that strangely influence the life of a community; the struggle of the strong and the weak—good angels and bad. All the characters are drawn with a master hand, and in not a few of the leading figures our readers may recognize types of some with whom they are not unfamiliar.

Look out for our issue of December 11, with the opening instalment. Should you desire to have your friends share with you the pleasure of reading The Mischief-Makers, we will send you extra copies of the opening number on request.

Among the Workers

—A CORRESPONDENT of the the New York Herald at Seoul is authority for the statement that Japan contemplates driving the missionaries out of Korea. Missionary letters contain no intimation of such a design and no news of any serious trouble in the "Hermit Kingdom."

—EVANGELIST H. D. SHELDON, of Auburn, N. Y., and singer Wallace Mitchell, of Reynoldsville, Pa., lately closed a successful evangelistic campaign with the churches of Northville, N. Y. All the churches were united. The work was thorough and gives indication of permanency. Each church will receive many accessions.

The Dizzy Height of Mont Pilatus

The Great Matterhorn

The Gornergrat Line

TO CLIMB THE SUMMITS OF THE ALPS BY RAILROAD

Alpine Railroads

SWISS scenery appears likely to become wholly the prey of the railroad. Five lines are in course of construction, or already in operation, which carry the mountain climber to the highest Alpine regions, and now it is proposed to construct one up the famous Matterhorn. Its projectors intend to go to a height of 14,682 feet, which is only sixty-five feet from the summit. Mountain climbers have organized a league to prevent the scheme, which they denounce as desecration, but the promoters are going ahead with the line, and believe that they will succeed. Their plan includes the building of observation galleries and the erection of a great hotel. Of the other lines that lead up the Righi was the pioneer. It has now two branches, one from each side of the mountain, which effect a junction about a mile from the summit. A second, which ascends Gornergrat, was the first to penetrate the upper region of the Alps. The whole line traverses a region of perpetual ice and snow. A third is that known as Mont Pilatus, which enjoys the distinction of being the steepest railroad in the world. It has a maximum gradient of forty-eight per cent. and an average gradient of forty-two. It is run on the rack and pinion system. The fourth is the famous Jungfrau. It starts on what is known as the Little Schidegg and after running a little over a mile, enters a tunnel and winds up to the summit. This avoids the ground of opposition, as it does not desecrate the scenery. Neither does it keep the traveler altogether in darkness. Caverns cut out of the face of the mountain form the stations, from which a thrilling view is obtained of the valley. . The fifth line is to go up the Matterhorn. It is to be a cable railroad, the cars being suspended by running gear. It is to this and to the one up the Matterhorn that the opposition is being organized. No one doubts that the railroads would enable many more people than now to enjoy the spectacle from the Alps, but there is a sentimental reluctance to have the modern means of travel introduced among nature's great solitudes. The opposition is not likely to prevail. The modern spirit has no sentiment and considers only whether a project will pay. Though the scientist cannot accept the challenge of theancient patriarch, he can make a way that any one with funds can take.

He putteth forth his hand upon the rock; he overturneth the mountains by the roots. (Job 28 : 9.)

Planetary Disturbances

A telegram from Prof. Percival Lowell, who is at his observatory at Flagstaff, Arizona, announces that an extraordinary disturbance is now taking place in the mysterious rings that surround the planet Saturn. He had noticed that the rings were no longer of uniform brightness, but had in them at irregular intervals lurid spots, showing intense condensation. At this season the rings are presented edgewise to the observer on the earth, and it is possible to examine their density more accurately. Prof. Lowell expresses the belief that they are not vaporous as was formerly supposed, but are composed of solid bodies, the innumerable satellites of the planet, revolving around it. He thinks that there has been a vast collision of members of the swarm, with the result that the rings themselves are falling in on the planet. Prof. Brashear of Allegheny, discussing Prof. Lowell's theory, says that a similar phenomenon is taking place on a scale many times greater in the nebulæ of Andromeda. It would appear that the making and the ending of worlds is going on still in the skies. The astronomers are proving that gigantic forces are operating, the power of which is beyond our conception. But their revelations are of less moment to us than those of the inspired poet of ancient days.

The heavens are the work of thy hands: they shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. (Ps. 102 : 25–27.)

Died to Save a Town

A hero of the rail sacrificed his life to save a town on November 8. James Garcia was in charge of a train on the road crossing the Rio Grande, Mexico. He was on his way to the Pilares Mine with cars laden with provisions, machinery and blasting powder to be used by the miners. The train was halted at Nacozari, a mountain town, when a brakeman called out that a car was on fire. Garcia took one look at the populous town, and realized that an explosion would destroy many lives and wreck the town buildings. Perceiving that it was impossible to extinguish the flames before they reached the powder, he resolved to run the train into the open country. Forcing his fireman and brakeman to quit the train, he threw open the throttle and the engine was soon rushing at its utmost speed out of the town limits. The train cleared the limits of the town before the explosion came. Garcia's body was blown to fragments and twelve miners who had flocked to the rails to witness the spectacle of the burning train were also killed. The windows of every house in Nacozari were broken by the explosion, but thanks to the prompt self-sacrifice of the noble engineer, no one was hurt. The people of the town have reason to be thankful that in the emergency the train was in charge of a man who cared more for their safety than for his own life. Like Him of whom it was said, "He saved others, himself he could not save," he laid down his own life that others might live.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. (John 15 : 13.)

Descended from Kings

An amusing suit was tried last week in the City Court of New York. It was brought on behalf of a genealogist of Ardmore, Pa., to recover from the defendant, the wife of a banker, five hundred dollars for his services in tracing her ancestry. It appears that a society exists which calls itself "The Order of the Crown," the members of which claim to be descended from kings. The banker's wife desired to become a member of this order, and believing that one of her ancestors was Alfred the Great, employed the genealogist to verify the fact. She furnished him with a list of thirty-two names of her American ancestors, which led up to Thomas Dudley, who was Governor of Massachusetts in 1647. The links above this were missing, and these the genealogist was required to trace. He testified that he and his assistants had traced the pedigree not only to Alfred, but to Louis IV. and Charlemagne. He said he had spent one hundred days in the search and contended that five dollars a day was reasonable compensation. The court appears to have agreed with him, for it granted his claim. The lady, however, contended that he had not furnished satisfactory proofs of her descent through the thousand years that have elapsed since Alfred reigned. It would have been of more moment to her to have learned how she could have attained royal dignity in the future. It is of little value to prove her descent from kings, for some of them were not men to be proud of; and there were others so great, that to prove descent from them only emphasizes one's own degeneracy. The proof could not raise her to royal rank, as does that alliance of which those boast who sing the song of praise that the apostle heard.

Unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood and hath made us kings. (Rev. 1 : 5, 6.)

Warned by Wireless

The Old Dominion liner Jefferson, which arrived at New York last week, was received by a munificent fire boat, and a fire engine was on the dock. The captain had discovered, soon after leaving Norfolk, Va., that a fire was smouldering in the cotton, tobacco and bagging that formed part of her cargo. He endeavored to extinguish it by steam that the engineer turned into the hold, but it continued to burn. He would not alarm his passengers by telling them of their danger, but sent a wireless message to the owners of the steamer asking them to take measures in New York to deal with the trouble on her arrival. The message was received at Fire Island, the owners were notified, and considerable time was saved by having the fire brigade ready to act when the steamer came in. The fire was soon under control and steamer and cargo were saved. It must have been an anxious time for the captain, knowing how near he was all through the voyage to a terrible disaster. But he took the wise course in providing for speedy assistance. Men sometimes forget, when they realize how fierce are the fires in their own nature with which they have to contend, that there is a Power accessible by the prayer of faith, that is able to subdue the enemy.

Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. (Ps. 139 : 23, 24.)

A Pastor's Marvelous Experience

One of the most remarkable cases of escape from death occurred recently to the pastor of a Methodist church in New York. Sixteen months ago, while on his vacation in the Adirondacks, he climbed on the roof of his cottage to fix a shingle that was loose. He put several lath nails in his mouth while he worked, and suddenly, in a sharp intake of breath, one of them slipped down his throat. In a few days the throat became painful, and a doctor was summoned. The pastor told him the incident of the nail, but the doctor laughed at it. He said the nail could not have gone down, the pastor had made a mistake, and his malady was simply bronchitis. He treated him for that affection and gave him some relief, so that he could preach. But on his return to New York the pastor consulted other doctors, as he was hoarse and had frequent attacks of severe coughing. None of them believed that any foreign substance was in the lung, but the hoarseness grew worse, and the pastor at times could scarcely get through his services. One Sunday night recently, he was kneeling in prayer, when the cough came on. It grew very violent, and was accompanied by a sharp pain in the right lung. After a few minutes the pastor perceived that the cough was bringing up the obstruction, and in the next paroxysm the nail was raised sixteen months before came to light. His throat is still sore and lacerated, but he is rapidly recovering. The pastor thinks that his attitude when the cough began may have contributed to the removal of the nail. The doctors may be able to explain how that might be. As a clergyman he has frequent occasion to remark the people that it is in that attitude of earnest supplication to God that their spiritual as well as bodily troubles frequently come to relief, and the obstructions which affect their spiritual life are removed.

They brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases, and he healed them. (Luke 4 : 40.)

Love in Ancient Israel*

AMONG the records of strange conflicts of a barbaric time in which there was no settled condition of society and every man did that which was right in his own eyes, is the beautiful idyl of the heathen girl-widow. It is like a strain of sweet music amid the clash of hammers. Who could have written it? It is marvelous that even with the facts at hand, there should have been in that rough and warlike age a pen capable of presenting them with such tenderness and beauty. The author must have been a true poet, whose heart was open to the conception of sweet purity, and whose touch was so light and gentle that it could present the story in such delightful colors that it has charmed readers in every century. The story is told that in the raging passions of the French Revolution a company of literary men who scoffed at the Bible, were melted to tears by listening to the reading of the idyl, in ignorance of its origin.

The facts are familiar to every Bible reader. The Hebrew, pressed by poverty and hard times, resolves to emigrate to a land where the harvests are better and there is a brighter prospect for his two boys. It is true it is a heathen land and the religious customs of the people will be shocking to them; but what will not men do to improve their fortune? He takes his life into his own hands regardless of God, who controls every man's destiny. Lot did the same thing when he settled in Sodom, and like Lot, this man meets disaster. God is able to thwart any man who puts his material interests above those of his soul.

During the ten years they have been in their new home, the sons grew up and married and now, with their father, they fill graves in a strange land. Three widows are alone in the desolate home. From Naomi's later remarks that are reported we gather that she had a knowledge of God, narrow and superficial, but evidently true. Her conversation must have impressed the two girl-widows, otherwise they would not have decided to accompany her back to Judea. It was only when she set the situation before them in all its grim prospects that one of them turned back. Many a girl like Orpah, has turned away from religion, scared by the self-denial it involves, while another proving faithful has, like Ruth, made the best of both worlds.

The later incidents do not give us a favorable idea of Naomi. No woman, whatever the difficulties of her lot, has the right to expose a girl to such a hazard as that she induced Ruth to run with Boaz. It turned out well, but if Boaz had been a different kind of man, the girl would have been ruined. The managing mothers of our time run a similar risk to secure rich husbands for their daughters, but their responsibility is awful, and sometimes it is the daughters who have to pay the penalty.

China Missionaries Grateful

HWAI ANFU, CHINA.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: The North Kiangsu Famine Relief Committee at a recent meeting passed a resolution expressive of its grateful appreciation of your liberality and successful labors in procuring contributions to aid the starving multitudes. We know that, through your instrumentality, immense good has been accomplished, and on behalf of the committee we tender you and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thanks on behalf of the hundreds of thousands whom your generous aid has rescued from suffering and death. The committee wished also to express its pleasure at meeting Mr. E. R. Johnstone, the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on the occasion of his visit to the famine field, and their satisfaction at the intelligent and tactful manner in which he discharged his duties in connection with the distribution of the Buford's cargo of flour and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Funds.

We trust the divine blessing may follow the charitable work which has been done through your aid, and that the good which you have done to others may be sent back to you "a hundredfold" in your own life and work.

BE SURE AND COME HOME FOR THANKSGIVING

JOHN G. HALLIMOND VICTOR H. BENKE

1. Be sure and come home for Thanksgiving, You've been such a long time a - way;
2. Be sure and come home for Thanksgiving, We yearn for the sight of your face;
3. Be sure and come home for Thanksgiving, We'll count ev-'ry mo - ment till then,

We've felt all so lone - ly with - out you, And we've watch'd for you night and day.
We long to be clasp'd to your bo - som, In a lov - ing and ten - der em - brace.
For we'll be the merriest of chil - dren, And you'll be the happiest of men.

Dear fa - ther the sad tears are fall - ing From mother's sweet pit - i - ful eyes,
Dear fa - ther the shad-ows will van - ish, The clouds pass for - ev - er a - way,
We'll make it a real Thanks-giv - ing, Our praise like sweet mu - sic shall swell,

But her smile will come back when she sees you, Like sun-rays that brigh-ten the skies.
When you're home to partake and to bright-en The glad-ness of Thanks-giv - ing Day.
To Him who has bro't back the wan - d'rer To the Fa-ther who does all things well.

CHORUS.

Come home, come home for Thanks-giv - ing! Re - turn to your lov'd ones at home;.....

Be sure and come home for Thanks-giv - ing, O promise, dear fa-ther, you'll come.

God in His World*

EFFORTS have been made in every age to exclude God from his o world. The old theory that it came together by chance, without his intervention, was abandoned more than a century ago. Evolution only set his intervention further back and explained the creation as a process. Even evolution demanded a starting-point, which must be in a Creator. A similar movement deals with God in providence. It was contended that he had wound the world up as a man does a clock and left it to proceed uncared for. The catastrophes, natural convulsions, tidal waves and earthquakes, all involving suffering and death, were cited as proof of this theory. But the Bible destroys it root and branch, and teaches that God is in his world, still working among his creatures. Not in ignorance, not in indifference, does he survey the struggles and sorrows of men, but sympathizing with them he seeks to aid them.

That theory makes an immense change in the human situation. If Christ had brought no other message to mankind than the fatherhood of God, his coming would have been the greatest era in the world's history. Man need no longer blindly grope after the light, he was no longer an orphan; but around him and about him were everlasting arms and a mysterious personality who loved and desired love. There was much that Christ did not and could not tell us of his Father, but he told us sufficient to give us confidence in the divine wisdom and love. There is more to be revealed of that mysterious nature, but it comforts us to know that he who knew God best loved him best and delighted in communion with him.

This enlightening, transforming message, incomplete as it is, Christ bade us make known through the world. He knew its effect more clearly than his disciples did, and he would have it made the possession of every living being. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," but in this stage of our development that message is sufficient. We have confidence that as we advance after passing through the grave, revelations appropriate to the new stage will be given. That they will be reversals, we cannot believe. They will be continuations and will contain clearer views of the same truth. We now know in part, but that part will grow and extend until we know in perfection.

Beautiful Xmas Presents

For those who are looking for suitable Christmas gifts to bestow upon friends and acquaintances, at trifling cost, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Art Department offers an excellent opportunity. We have on hand a limited number of copies of the famous historical painting, entitled "Washington's Triumphal Entry into New York, Nov. 25, 1783," measuring 18x24 inches, printed in eleven colors. This fine patriotic painting will be mailed to any address, on receipt of 25 cents.

We have also a few sets left of the beautiful Companion Pictures: Good Night and Good Morning—incomparable studies of child faces, by Stork, the famous German artist, reproduced in all the delightful coloring of the originals. This pair of charming pictures, each mounted on peacock blue art paper, size 12½ by 16 inches, ready for framing, will be mailed to any address on receipt of one dollar for the two.

Address, CHRISTIAN HERALD Art Dep't, Bible House, New York City.

A Great "Animal Book"

My Dear Dr. Klopsch: "Animal Book" received. To say I am very well pleased is putting it mildly. It certainly is a fine premium. Accept thanks for same.

Bethlehem, Pa. DR. BAUCH.

NEW LIGHT ON NEHEMIAH'S TIMES

NEW light is unexpectedly thrown on Jewish history by the discovery of an ancient papyrus in Egypt. The German Scientific Mission is conducting explorations in the island of Elephantine, which lies in the River Nile opposite Assouan, where the huge dam has recently been made. Elephantine was evidently a religious centre in ancient times and was as rich in Egyptian temples as Philæ. In exploring the island the German society found the papyrus, and it has been deciphered by Prof. Sachau, of Berlin. It proves to be a document of the period of Nehemiah, and is of inestimable value as corroborating his narrative. It mentions Johanan, Jehoiada, Sanballat and other names with which readers of the Bible are familiar, and it shows that Nehemiah's characterization of them was absolutely accurate.

How does a papyrus relating to the Jews come to be in Africa? For answer we must go back in history to that time of desolation and dispersion which befell the Jews after the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The Chronicles and the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel tell us that previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, there was an influential political party among the Jews, that was eager for an alliance with Egypt against the Babylonians. Many took refuge in Egypt when Nebuchadnezzar menaced the city, and after it was captured and the temple burned, those who escaped deportation to Babylon followed their countrymen thither. They took Jeremiah with them against his will, and they lived at Tahpanhes, a town of lower Egypt on the eastern border (see Jer. 43: 6, 7). Jeremiah also mentions (Jer. 44 : 1) that there were Jewish colonies at Migdol and Noph in the Pathros region. They settled there, probably that they might be near the roads by which information as to their brethren in Judea would reach them, and also that they might be ready to return when the way was open.

So much we learn from the Bible. The newly discovered papyrus contains a record which carries us a stage further. It is a petition from certain Jews to the Persian governor for redress. It relates that a temple which they had erected at Elephantine had been destroyed by their enemies and they begged permission to rebuild it. We gather from the papyrus that the son of their old enemy Sanballat, who had been a thorn in the flesh to Nehemiah (see Neh. 4: 1), opposed the rebuilding, if he had not caused the destruction of the temple. This is the first information that has come down to us that the Jews had a temple at Elephantine, but it is conceivable that the Egyptian government, being favorable to them, permitted them to erect a temple among the others on the sacred island. In their petition the Jews claim that when the Persian conqueror destroyed the Egyptian temples, he had spared theirs, but it had been destroyed later.

A rapid glance at the history of the period explains this fact. Cyrus, who is mentioned in II Chron. 36: 22, had been the friend and protector of the Jews, whom he found captives in Babylon, and had given them permission to return to Jerusalem (Ezra 1: 1-4). His son and successor, Cambyses III., whom Ezra calls Ahasuerus (Ezra 4: 6), continued his father's kindness, and when he conquered Egypt, would naturally spare the Jewish temple at Elephantine, while destroying the temples dedicated to idolatry, which he hated as heartily as did the Jews. But his successor, the usurper Gaumates (called by Ezra, Artaxerxes), had no sympathy with the Jews and gave a ready ear to their enemies. He ordered the cessation of work on the temple at Jerusalem (see Ezra 4: 7-23), and would naturally connive at the destruction of the one at Elephantine. But his reign was short, and when Darius succeeded him, the Jerusalem temple was speedily finished and the destroyers of the Elephantine temple were punished. It was the intervention of Darius that the signers of the papyrus invoked.

The whole story as related by the papyrus so exactly dovetails with the incidents recorded by Nehemiah and the other Biblical writers as to afford strong confirmation at first hand. Perhaps further exploration may shed more light and may give us the information, so long sought, of the hiding place of the Ark of the Covenant, which so mysteriously disappeared about the time when this settlement on the Nile was made.

"The women fill their large earthen pots with water and carry them on their heads. All the water they use is carried in this way to their kraal. We are constantly reminded of Bible stories by what we see; so must the women of the Bible have fetched and carried water. We camped under a pile of huge rocks, close to a large kraal. The people have built little granaries all over these rocks to keep their corn from the ants. Before it was dark, we heard a great screeching over our heads, and looking up, saw numbers of green parrots flying about. We here met a young man named Johannes, a Christian, who preaches in the kraals around. Some years ago he went to the Transvaal to work. While there he was converted, and after a while he felt he must come back to his own people and tell them the good news; so he lives among them and of his own accord preaches to them Jesus.

"Many chiefs and native rulers of importance were met on this memorable journey. Chief Jenjezwa expressed a desire to have a missionary come to teach his people. Near Gambakwe's kraal (the father of Johannes) we passed through some very beautiful country, quite park-like in appearance. This kraal is situated under a rocky mountain inhabited by troops of baboons. They were exceedingly quarrelsome at night and made a great noise, the little ones shrieking as if they were being beaten. No doubt they were, as the mothers do sometimes correct them most unmercifully.

"One kraal we passed through where the children ran off screaming with terror. One poor little mite ran screaming: 'Yowe mbuya! yowe mbuya!' (Oh, grandmother! Oh, grandmother!) When we reached Jiri's kraal, we found sixty-five huts, averaging four persons for a hut. They seemed very wild and filled with a great curiosity. A crowd gathered round watching us when we sat down to dinner, and it was a matter of astonishment to see us spread our cloth, with plates, knives and forks.

"Next day, two of the king's wives came to our tent, loaded with ornaments and looking very picturesque. Mr. Wodehouse tried to take their pictures, but when they saw him point the camera at them, they ran off in terror. As the people gathered round to sell oofoo, we began to speak to them about God, as we felt we could not leave without giving the Gospel message; but they said they had never heard about God and did not want their children to learn these things. We were sad to think of these people steeped in darkness not wanting the light."

At one point on the tour a baboon joined the party, but it could not become friendly with the dogs. Their path frequently led through most beautiful well-watered rolling country, abounding in ferns, flowers, and waterfalls. Basutos brought them fresh milk, which was greatly relished. These Basutos have heard the Gospel. Mrs. Wodehouse here draws an almost idyllic picture:

"We heard singing at a little distance. It drew nearer, and soon quite a company of men, women and children reached our tent and sang several hymns in their own language. It seemed a very beautiful thing for them to do, and I could not restrain my tears as they sang 'In the sweet by and by.' What a difference for them to be singing these beautiful hymns instead of the wild chants they sing in the heathen kraals; yet there are many who say 'missions are a failure.'"

One of the few missionaries encountered was a Mr. Wedepohl, who lived with his wife among these simple people. He had built himself a brick house, all the woodwork of which was solid mahogany, that wood being abundant there. He is an accomplished musician, and delighted the travelers with the classical strains of Mendelssohn and Beethoven.

Many curious things were noted by the travelers. At one kraal "the women gave us a strange greeting — a sort of shrill scream which they make through their teeth and beating each cheek. It is the salute they give to their king." At another kraal they found the women wailing, chanting a dirge for the dead.

There were physical perils too, and very real ones for the travelers. At night they could hear the shriek of the hyena, the bark of the jackal, and occasionally the deep roaring of a lion. They had to barricade the camp and keep fires burning. Our narrator writes: "On leaving Chumgy's kraal . . . we camped in a very wild part where there are lions, leopards and wolves; but all the precautions have been taken and our camp is ablaze with fires. The donkeys and the boys are all kraaled, and we have a large fire in front of our tents; also the gentlemen have their guns loaded, and we have committed ourselves to our ever-watchful God. We were awakened in the night by a most unearthly yell. We rushed to the door of our tent. All the boys were shrieking and running toward us. We made sure a lion was in camp. Of course none of us got much sleep after the alarm.

"Chief Nyashana came to see us next morning. He had never seen a white woman before, so Annie and I were subjects of great curiosity. In the afternoon we had a service with the kraal people, the chief and his retinue being present."

Here is an attractive picture of strange contrasts:

"On another night we heard the hyena again, quite close to our camp outside a kraal. The rats were running up and down the outside of our tent; we could see their shadows on the canvas. The kraals we have visited for days past have never heard the Gospel before, and are utterly benighted. We reached the Sabi river at half-past ten, and it took us three quarters of an hour to cross the river. The heat was intense, but the trees and foliage were very beautiful. The gigantic baobab stretches out its weird arms; and we can see the beautiful blue waters of the river. I heard just now Mr. Greeley's little Alfred and Farakanyi singing, 'Is not this the land of Beulah?'

"Coming along this morning, we saw three beautiful zebras, which stood still and looked at our donkey, as though they wanted to claim relationship. The boys have put large branches all round our camp, so that we seem surrounded by a green hedge, while the trees inside our enclosure are bending their branches to nearly meet the ground, and the stars look down upon us from a deep blue sky, making us feel as if we were in some imagined land of beauty that could scarcely be a reality. Added to this, the boys gathered round for prayer and praise made it seem the very gate of heaven."

At the Sabi River, they found a lion's tracks on the sand, and also traces of hippopotami and crocodiles; but, nothing daunted, the travelers waded in the stream for refreshment. They afterward found many hippo tracks. A little farther on, they reached the kraal of a petty king, M'Ranki, who received them kindly and paid them a visit in person. He desired that all the children in his kraal should go to school. Mr. Wodehouse preached to them, the king being present. The writer says of this occasion:

"The king was most attentive. When we knelt to pray, he knelt also, a thing he has never done before. After the service we sat down to the organ, and soon a crowd gathered round and we led them in singing several hymns. A year ago, these women were wild and scarcely covered. Now, a large number of them, especially the younger ones, are decently clothed and join in singing Christian hymns."

This hospitable African king sent them presents of food, and gave a brass bangle to Mrs. Wodehouse as a farewell gift. The journey homeward to Umtali was accomplished without serious mishaps, although they had to pass through a country frequented by lions; but the camp-fires, the vigilance of their native helpers and the knowledge of the divine [illegible] kept them in safety. They reached their destination after more than seven weeks' absence, full of gratitude to God for all that had taken place.

LOVE'S EVER-WIDENING CIRCLES

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN imagination let us paint twelve pictures of Ruth the Moabitess, who is one of the most lovely of the lovely persons in the Bible.

First picture. We paint her first as a bride, with another bride, her sister-in-law, Orpah. The two bridegrooms, brothers, are delicate looking men, not strong. They are strangers in the country of Moab, having come there only recently from Bethlehem in Judah, to escape the famine. Let us put a fifth person in the picture. It is Naomi, the mother of the bridegrooms. She is dressed in a widow's garb, her husband having died since coming to Moab.

Second picture. In the second picture we paint Ruth as a widow, and there are two other widows with her, for Orpah is also widowed, as Naomi was. Naomi has the greater sorrow in that her two sons are dead as well as her husband.

Ruth's Decision

Third picture. In the third picture we have the three widows again, out on the highway, with their faces turned toward Bethlehem, for Naomi is leaving Moab. Ruth and Orpah are walking on either side of her. Naomi is entreating them in their own interest to leave her, and return to Moab. There is a look of assent in Orpah's face, but Ruth is sweetly determined to press on with Naomi.

Fourth picture. Naomi and Ruth are entering Bethlehem, Orpah having returned to Moab, and Naomi is being warmly greeted by her former neighbors; but her sad face is in keeping with her widow's garb as she bids them call her by the name not of Naomi, meaning "delight," but of Mara, which means "bitterness." Sweet-faced Ruth clings to her, and Naomi tells her friends that she is the widow of her son, and that she has turned from the worship of Baal to the true God, and that she has chosen God's people to be her people. Ruth therefore receives a warm greeting.

Fifth picture. Naomi and Ruth are domiciled in Naomi's home in Bethlehem, but there is no son or husband to provide food for them. Ruth comforts Naomi by saying she will go out to glean in the fields that they may have food.

Sixth picture. Ruth is in the harvest field at her daily task, patiently picking up each head of barley left by the reapers, and then threshing it out against the stones to carry home—a small amount, hardly enough for Naomi and herself.

Seventh picture. Boaz, master of the farm, has come into the field, and greets his laborers with words of blessing: "Jehovah be with you," and they reply: "Jehovah bless thee." Boaz sees Ruth in the near distance engaged in gleaning, and asks who she is. When told that she is the daughter-in-law of Naomi, who has returned with her from Moab, and that she is gathering food for Naomi and herself, Boaz bids Ruth come to him, and he tells her that she may eat food with his laborers, and drink water with them. Ruth looks inquiringly into Boaz's face, and asks why she is to receive this favor from him, and he tells her it is because he has heard of her great kindness to Naomi.

Ruth's Reward

Eighth picture. Ruth is gleaning in Boaz's field close beside the reapers; for so Boaz has given her permission to do. She gathers the barley more rapidly than before, about five pints a day, because Boaz has told the reapers to gather the grain less carefully, and leave more for this favored gleaner.

Ninth picture. Ruth is placing before Naomi the larger amount of barley, and in surprise Naomi is asking Ruth, "Where hast thou gleaned to-day?" And when Ruth tells her in the field of Boaz, Naomi's sad face is lighted with a new hope as she bids Ruth go to Boaz's field every day until the end of the harvest.

Tenth picture. Ruth is again a bride, and Boaz is the bridegroom. The hope of Naomi is realized.

Eleventh picture. A happy family group in which Boaz is the father, Ruth the mother, Obed the little son, and Naomi the happy grandmother.

Twelfth picture. Ruth dead many long years, and buried beside her husband Boaz. But she was not forgotten, for her son Obed had become the father of Jesse, whose son, King David, was Israel's poet king, whose memory was dear to the hearts of all his people. Many generations have been born and have lived and died, and now Bethlehem is the scene of another birth—that of King David's greater Son, the Saviour of the world. There he lies, wrapped as Jewish infants always were, in the quaint garments known as swaddling clothes, with no other cradle than the manger out of which the cattle ate. But his birth had been heralded by angels, and he had received the homage of the wise men from the East.

The Heart Broadened

In passing from the story of Samson to that of Ruth, we turn from war to peace, from lust to love, from titanic force to the might of gentleness. History is chiefly occupied with the stories of kings and wars, but to really understand a period we need also such views of social life as this story of Ruth affords, with its pictures not only of household love, but also of friendly relations between labor and capital, and between people of different nationalities. We get several glimpses in this lesson of the divine plan by which selfish men are enabled by gradual steps to obey the hard command: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," which is interpreted in the parable of the Good Samaritan to mean a love that overleaps even national boundaries, and seeks the welfare of every class and race. This divine plan of broadening the heart, until, like the ocean, it reaches out sympathetically and helpfully to all shores, includes ever-widening circles of love: first, the home circle, twice pictured in this lesson in the homes of Naomi and Boaz; second, the larger neighborhood circle, pictured in the affection with which Naomi's neighbors welcomed her back, and also in the cordial exchange of benedictions between capital and labor in the persons of Boaz and his happy employees; third, the circle of city patriotism, which may well have been strong in the early days of historic Bethlehem; fourth, the circle of national patriotism, which was unusually strong among the Jews; and fifth, the circle of a world love that leaps national and race boundaries, of which the mutual love of Naomi, the Jewess, and Ruth, the Moabitess, is the most beautiful concrete and personal example.

The oceans of His love are wide;
They touch the bounds of all his world;
And round the farthest island curled,
They bear his word on every tide.

But what hath greater joy for me
Is that my lesser harbor knows
The fulness of the tide that flows
Is from his love's unfathomed sea.

In view of the foolish habit of abusing mothers-in-law as if they were all wrong, which is kindred to the yet more unwarranted assumption that most ministers' sons are ne'er-do-wells, it is worth while to dwell on the story of the mother-in-law in this lesson, whose name meant pleasantness, and who made it good. She might well be called a mother-in-love. She had faults enough to prove her quite human. It was probably a sin, in which the wife may have shared, that the family fled to heathen Moab when Israel was being chastened with famine for its sins. It would have been better to trust in God and stay at home in Bethlehem. Was it not like the sin of Abraham in going to Egypt when there was a famine in Canaan, and of David in taking refuge from Saul among the Philistines, both of which flights brought new physical perils, with moral danger also, and both of which God disapproved? The giving of Naomi's sons to heathen wives was in violation of explicit divine commands, though overruled for good, like many another wrong. The deaths the family sought to avoid by fleeing from the famine in Israel came in Moab to all the household except Naomi. The result could hardly have been worse if they had remained at home. Naomi's words on her return seem to admit that she saw in these events the signs of God's displeasure and chastening. On the other hand we see as she returns that she had not been leavened by her heathen surroundings, but had shown such a winsome piety that one of the two heathen daughters-in-law had been drawn irresistibly, not only to her but to her God. In Ruth's burst of devotion there is no future tense in the original. It is: "Thy people, my people; thy God, my God."

Saved Through Affection

This part of the story shows how personal affection, especially in the home, may become a missionary sickle to glean souls for God. There are many houses that can hardly be called homes because there is so little expression of affection. The father, absorbed in business, thinks his duty fully done when he has proved himself "a good provider." He is drudging so constantly for dollars and a great name to leave his family when he dies, that he has no time while he is alive to give wife or child their due of loving words and fellowships. In some cases, a husband who really loves his family deeply almost never says so, allowing an affectionate wife and loving child to starve for love while his heart is full of it, though hidden by a strange reticence.

I looked for Fame, and Love came flitting by,
But paused a while, with bated wings to sigh;
But still I looked for Fame, and Love flew by.

Fame came at last, when hope was almost sped;
Fame came at last, when youth and joy had fled;
And then I looked for Love, but Love was dead.

The great moment in all the story of Ruth, on which all turns, was when she made a deliberate choice to go on with Naomi to God's country, rather than go back with Orpah to her own land. In Moab, she would be likely to marry again and live in comfort, but the perils of idolatry would be about her to draw her back to heathenism, while in Israel, with poverty, she would have Naomi's loving help to a godly life. Like Moses, in a similar case, she "chose to suffer affliction with the people of God rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." She seemed to be "giving up" much to follow God, but as the sequel shows, she did not even lose in this world by her right choice.
